GILCHRIST—DOWNEY

The home of Mr and Mrs Jas Downey, 2nd con Bruce, was the scene of a very pretty event on Wednesday, Dec 30, when their eldest daughter Mary Victoria, was wed in marriage to Mr Alexander Gilchrist. The ceremony was performed by Rev A De Mille of Glamis, and the wedding march was played by Mr Bigger, brother-in-law of the bride. The groom, attended by his brother Mr Douglas Gilchrist, took his place in the parlor under an arch of evergreens and Christmas bells, where he was joined by the bride, who, looking charming in her travelling suit of Alice blue, entered leaning on the arm of her father and attended by her sister Miss Mabel Downey, prettily dressed in Alice blue crepe. After the ceremony was performed and congratulations were extended to the newly married couple the guests, numbering about 30, sat down to a sumptuous wedding dinner. The evening was made enjoyable to all by a programme of music and speeches. The groom's gift to the bride was a black fox stole, to the bridesmaid a lavalliere set with pearls and amethysts, and to the groomsman a gold watch chain. The bride to the young couple were many and costly. Among the guests from a distance were Mr and Mrs Henry Biggar of Niagara Falls, Miss Mertle Downey of Toronto and Mrs Fenwick from Spokane, Wash. Mr and Mrs Gilchrist left on the 6 p.m. train amid showers of confetti and good wishes for a two weeks' visit among the bride's many friends in Toronto, Raymore and points. On their return they will reside on the groom's farm, 2nd con Bruce.

McKINNON—CHALMERS

On Wednesday evening, Dec 30th, a very pretty wedding was solemnized at the home of the bride's parents, Mr and Mrs Robt Chalmers, 12th con Bruce, when their youngest daughter, Verna Beatrice, was united in the holy bonds of matrimony to Mr David F McKinnon, of Ashaw, Sask. Rev R H Sawers, of Queen street church, officiating. The bride, who looked handsome in her wedding gown of white bridal crepe de meteor, trimmed with Irish lace and carrying a bouquet of white roses and maiden hair fern, entered the parlor on the arm of her father to the strains of the bridal chorus, played by Miss Sawers. Miss Madeleine Jamieson, niece of the bride, of Elm Creek, Man, who acted as maid-of-honor, was dressed in white silk and net. After the ceremony a delightful sumptuous luncheon was served. The remainder of the evening was spent in pleasant entertainment, a good program of vocal and instrumental music being rendered. Many handsome and useful presents received by the bride and groom go to show how highly they are esteemed in the neighborhood. The young couple will make their home near Ashford, Sask, and will have the best wishes and

HOCKEY NOTES

The Chesley Northern League team played a friendly game with the locals here on Friday evening last, the visitors getting away with the long end of an 11—6 score. Considering the little practice the Paisley boys have had, they made a pretty good showing. It must be admitted that the Chesley team is a pretty speedy aggregation and should give a good account of themselves in their district of the Northern League.

The first game in the town league was pulled off on Monday night before skating, when the Giants trimmed the Millionaires to the tune of 7—2. Play was close in the early part of the game, but in the latter stages the Giants made rather a runaway of it and secured several goals in quick succession. The Millionaires were without the services of one of their "stars" and expect to do better in their next game. Owing to some of the players not being on hand, the game was played with five men a side. The teams lined up as follows:

Giants—Diehl, Rolston, Muir, Barnett and Elwer.

Millionaires—Murcar, McKenzie, Cottrill, Hamilton and McKenzie.

Two games were pulled off on Tuesday night in the local league. The first—between the Giants and the Stars, resulted in a win for the Stars by 12 goals to 6. This was a big surprise, as it was generally believed that the Giants would win. In the second game the Athletics trounced the Millionaires 9—3, making the second loss for the latter in as many nights.

	Won	Lost
Athletics	1	0
Stars	1	0
Millionaires	0	2

A VALUABLE PAPER

The opportunities of the coming year, from a farmer's point of view appear to be many. Owing to the war there will be a shortage of crops in Europe, and therefore an extra demand for all kinds of farm products in Canada. This will afford an opportunity for the farmer who manages his farm in a business like way to reap a rich harvest. Every farmer who is farming for profit, should be a reader of the Weekly Sun, the Farmer's Business paper. There is no other farm paper in Ontario that supplies the farmer with the same reliable information as the Sun does. By perusing the Sun, you will gain a knowledge of the markets, which will enable you to sell your products to the best advantage. The subscription price will only be a fraction of the additional profits you will make by reading the Sun. When renewing your subscription for your local paper, you will make no mistake if you subscribe for the Sun, the Farmer's Business Paper.

McGREGOR—FUNSTON

A quiet wedding was solemnized Tuesday evening, December 29, 1914, at the home of Mr and Mrs Angus Morrison, 50 Jean street, Port Arthur, when Miss Euphemia Funston, of Kincardine, Ont., sister of Mrs Morrison, was married to Mr William Gregor McGregor, of the Canadian Towing and Wrecking company. Rev. G. K. B. Adams of Trinity Methodist performed the ceremony. On their return from a short wedding trip to Winnipeg Mr and Mrs McGregor will reside at 48 Jean St., Port Arthur.

CAMPBELL—McGILLIVRAY

On Monday, December 28th, at the home of the bride's parents, Christine, second daughter of Mr and Mrs Colin McGillivray, was married to Mr Donald A Campbell of Durham. Rev G C Little officiated. The bride's dress was of white crepe de chene, trimmed with seed pearls and lace. She carried white carnations, a gift from the hot-houses in Englehart, New Ontario. The ceremony was performed at half-past ten, in the presence of the family circle. Immediately afterwards dinner was served in the dining room which was festive with Christmas decorations, pink and white carnations being arranged on the table. Mr and Mrs Campbell took the afternoon train for Markdale on their honeymoon trip.

"Canada's Rally to the Empire"

The Greatest Event in Canada's History—the Talk of the Whole World

When the great Armada of thirty-one big ships, carrying thirty-two thousand of Canada's sons, and escorted by nineteen great British battleships, weighed anchor and sailed down the St Lawrence, carrying our men to aid in fighting the Empire's battles, few people realized it it meant to Canada. It has been the talk of the whole world. Statesmen and newspapers the world over commented on it and cried, "Brave, Canada." The Illustrated London News said the arrival was "an event unparalleled since William the Conqueror." It was truly a magnificent spectacle to see the great fleet setting sail, a sight never before seen on Canadian shores. News of the departure was censored and kept so secret that few indeed were on the scene to see the big ships weigh anchor on the Usaqe coast. This spectacle would have been lost to the people of Canada had not the Family Herald and Star of Montreal had their staff of photographers there to record it. Their photos of the great fleet are the best piece of photographic work in the history of the art. They secured a panoramic view showing miles and miles of the great troopships and battleships as they swung into line on the way to the Atlantic. In the picture The Family Herald and Weekly Star certainly possess a treasure. It will be the pride of their readers for years to come. It is 22 inches in length by 5 inches in length. It is reserved exclusively for Family Herald and Star subscribers and all who become subscribers for 1915. The picture will be sent free to anyone sending one dollar for a years subscription to that great paper. To demand is already enormous, and every home in Canada will want it. It will be Canada's great tradition, and years hence when historians are chronicling the great war the picture will count the most. It will have a peculiar value to every Canadian and will be a family heirloom. Take it up immediately. Family Herald and Weekly Star, Montreal.

The Darkest Hour;

Or, The Hope That Still Lived.

BOOK II.

CHAPTER I.

"He cannot come," Christine Dare said to the crowd that seethed about the little encampment near Stoke Newington, where she and Mrs. Winston were in this hour alone. "He is too ill to come; too ill even to leave his bed. But I have come to speak to you in his stead if you will hear me."

The crowd signified that it would hear her. So they stood looking up at the girl who was going to speak, and waited.

Christine's face did much for her. The picture that she made as she stood now in the doorway of Brian's empty tent was one which those who saw it would never forget in all their after years. There were people in the crowd at this very moment speaking of her as like an angel; and certainly the glory of her fair, rippling hair seemed to give something of truth to the comparison. But it was the human sweetness which most appealed to their hearts—the glistening softness of human [illegible] in the eyes, the human pleading that trembled on her quivering lips.

She locked her little hands together desperately. She was a brave girl, but it was a hard thing for her to stand here and face this eager, seething crowd alone.

"It is for his sake, Mr. Hardy's—that I am trying to find courage to say something to you without his support and help," she went on almost brokenly. "If you did not love him I could not do it. But I know that you do love him—love him—and believe in him—and that in your inmost hearts you feel as sure as I am that he has not on his soul the guilt of that crime on account of which people all over the country showed last year by means of thousands of letters, and also through the medium of the newspapers that they desired his death—his death on the Newgate gallows—and were indignant that he had not died. Many of them were good people, perhaps as good as he."

"Only one thing we know—Mrs. Winston, Brian Hardy, and myself and [illegible]—that some mysterious person dogs Mr. Hardy's steps with the hope of murder in his mind. That has been the case for nearly three years past. By water and by fire, by pistol, by unfair play at dangerous games, and now at last by poison, this unknown enemy has sought to secure Mr. Hardy's death. He gives no sign and yet he is ever close to his intended victim, so close that during the past year Brian Hardy has been in imminent peril of death whenever he has for a single moment been left alone."

The girl paused to take breath. The crowd was very still, very silent. Christine straightened her young, lithe figure as she stood on the little hillock before them.

"This last time, as you know, the attack was made by poison," she said. "We have no doubt—even the police have no doubt—that the same unknown and unseen enemy has been at work again. It is only by a miracle—a miracle due to God's love and God's grace that Brian Hardy has been spared."

There was a murmur in the crowd.

"Yes," Christine Dare repeated, involuntarily clenching her hand. "It was poison certainly; the doctors have no doubt about that. It was the terrible poison that is known as aconite. It had been poured into his coffee; there were traces of it in the dregs left in the cup. And yet there is no trace, no faintest trace of the unseen hand that put it there. Does this not show the cunning of the would-be slayer that in that public place among those dozens of workers, he came and did his dreadful work, and went away unseen?"

"We'll keep about 'im with our eyes open and our fists ready," one voice shouted, making itself heard above the rest. "It'll go 'ard with the scoundrel that's tried to murder 'im if we can get a sight and a 'old of 'im, I can tell you."

"And now, will you let me try to speak to you a little of Jesus?" she asked them sadly, yet not so softly but that every one of them heard the pleading, modest question. "There is not one of you who cannot be a good son, or husband, or father, if he likes, or a good daughter, wife, and mother if she likes. There is not one of you who cannot be an honest and conscientious worker if he or she chooses. Drive your nails, or build your walls, or sew your seams, or teach your children as if Heaven itself depended on your doing the work well. That is all you need to do to bring happiness and even beauty into the lives of the humblest and hardest-worked among you. That is all you need to do to make your light so shine among men that it shall be a living, flaming [illegible] to the glory of that Father who watches over us all."

When the members of this work-worn, [illegible] crowd dispersed to their several homes they walked more quietly than was their wont.

"It's more than likely as I shouldn't have been able to stand that from a man," one of the men remarked to a fellow-laborer with whom he was tramping towards Lewington. "I ain't sure as I could have stood it even from Mr. 'Ardy 'isself. But it's different somehow from a woman and 'specially from a young 'un like that, whose 'andsome, and who's got such a small waist as I could put my bulldog's collar round."

CHAPTER II.

"Well, and how goes the business?" Mrs. Crookenden asked as her brother, Ferdy Pocock, entered her private room in the Lombard Street office in response to her telephonic summons.

"Sit down," she added in a tone which made the recommendation a command.

The little red-headed broker obeyed her swiftly, though with manifest reluctance, and duly seated himself under the battery of her searching eyes.

"Business is better than ever. The Good Fortune Mine Shares have gone up to ten pounds each," he proceeded to explain, answering the question of her eyes. "Everybody is rushing to buy them."

The woman financier looked at him keenly.

"Has anything particular happened to account for this sudden increase in public confidence?" she asked.

Ferdy Pocock nodded and produced a white telegraph form from his breast pocket.

"I had written this out and was just going to send it off to you when you telephoned for me," he said as he handed it to her. "Australia—Sydney—is at the root of the business. Something has woke 'em up out there all of a sudden. But I dare say you'll understand it better than I do."

"News just arrived by cable of influential support in Sydney. Pitchford just invested seventy-five thousand pounds in Good Fortune Shares."

"I don't know who Pitchford is, nor why he's been buying up our shares to that tune," remarked the little broker when his patron had finished reading the brief communication. "You know, of course." He grinned insolently, of course as he spoke. "But it's a clever dodge, anyhow, and it's produced an amazing effect. People are saying, of course, that if a man who lives next door, so to speak, to the mine we're selling and must have visited it, thinks it worth the investment of seventy-five thousand pounds, why——" he put out his hands with a gesture that said more than words could have done. "They're all running after the shares now like madmen," he concluded in a tone of positive consternation.

Mrs. Crookenden smiled.

"That is very satisfactory," she said, quietly. "By the way, I am thinking also of the Brian Hardy affair—of the latest manifestation of it. This game is very interesting, and it would please me exceedingly to know how you managed to introduce the aconite into the coffee without being personally noticed, and without including others than Mr. Hardy among your victims."

Ferdy Pocock laughed roughly and harshly.

"It's just because I'm careful that I keep on making such a beastly hash of the job," he muttered with suppressed rage. "Another half-grain of the stuff the other night and the thing would have been done, I tell you. It was a near thing when that cursed waiter came round. I was thankful that there was a man's overcoat hanging up in that little square lobby, and that I was small enough to hide behind it."

Mrs. Crookenden made a gesture of comprehension.

"How did you know the cup was for the right man?" she inquired.

"Hardy was only one of Wimpole Sturgess's party that had ordered coffee. The rest had brandy and liqueurs only. I had overheard one of the waiters saying this. That was the stroke of luck that gave me my chance—the chance that has turned out useless to me after all."

The dark, majestic woman on the other side of the writing table surveyed him critically then from head to foot.

"Did you go into the restaurant just as you are now—looking as you look every day of your life in the City and elsewhere?"

The little man's small, shifty eyes turned on her sharply enough then.

"Did you think I could be such a fool as that? Not a bit of it. I was a waiter there that night; an extra hand taken on just by chance, according to the requirements of the evening. I was, as a matter of fact, one of two others were. I got no pay from the management because the tips [illegible] are supposed to be good enough pay to make it worth a man's while to go there for nothing."

A boy came at the door and a clerk entered with the intimation that Mr. Ronald [illegible] in the outer office asking to see her for a few moments on urgent business.

"Show him in," she said quickly, but showing no surprise and no particular interest. Little did she dream, as in her turn she welcomed him with her cruel smile, that this interview was to see the beginning of the most terrible tragedy of her tragic life, the most terrible, the most pitiful, and the last.

CHAPTER III

It was a quarter to twelve on the second Saturday night after her engagement as assistant in the Brixton drapery shop when Maggie Maitland dragged her aching limbs upstairs to the dormitory to make up the little parcel of things that she had to carry home.

They were only her nightgown, her soap and brush and comb, and the one photograph which her little family possessed—namely, that of little Alice, taken in the summer a month or two before the father had died. In her pocket she had a letter that had come to her in the morning from her lover away over [illegible], the old mother and little Alice had spent a penny to post it on to her in a fresh envelope, because they knew the joy that it would put into her heart. She had not read it yet; there had not been a free moment in all the day in which she could read even part of it. She had broken the envelope and looked at the beginning, "My little darling," but that was all. She had hoped to read it up here in the quiet dormitory before starting to go homeward, but her tiredness had made her so slow with her packing up and folding away of the goods after the shutting of the shop that it was too late for her to linger here, even for five minutes. She forced herself to move about quickly, collecting the little things for her parcel. She had gathered together all the rest and tied them neatly down inside the brown paper which was to contain them, when she went to the mantelpiece which was near the bed that was hers on the other nights of the week to take the little picture of Alice.

But when she reached the mantelpiece her heart sank with surprise and a sudden chill apprehension. The photograph was not there.

Late though the hour was, and worn out though she was with such fatigue as her young limbs had never known until these past three weeks of hard toil and tramping in London, Maggie Maitland went to and fro in the empty dormitory, empty and bare almost as a room which was never inhabited, searching desperately everywhere for the treasure which had so curiously disappeared. In her sharp anxiety she had forgotten that even the latest of her fellow-assistants must have left the shop at least three-quarters of an hour ago; she was actually going down to make inquiries of them, and to ask them to help her to search. Her intentions were rudely thwarted, however, by the appearance of Mr. Jeffery at the foot of the staircase.

"What's the meaning of this?" he demanded in a tone that boded unpleasantness. "Why aren't you gone yet?"

"I beg your pardon, sir. I've been looking for something that I wanted to take home with me. I—I left it on the mantelpiece this morning, and now it isn't there, and it isn't in the room anywhere. I can't think where it's gone to. I did want to find it tonight, but now that it's so late, I must go home without it, and look for it again when I come back on Monday."

"You'll have other things to do when you come back on Monday than waste your time looking about for some trumpery twopenny thing that's happened to drop into a corner somewhere out of your sight," remarked the proprietor of the shop, with a grim smile. Looking directly at her tired young face—so very tired it was, and so thin and white—he saw that her candid eyes were full of tears. "What sort of a thing is it that you're making such a nonsensical fuss over?" he felt sufficiently interested to ask. "Of course, you ought to know that you've no business to put anything on the dormitory mantelpiece."

"It was a photograph, sir," Maggie answered quickly, with a sudden gleam of new hope in her heart.

"Oh, that's it, is it?" Mr. Jeffery interrupted, in the tone of one who has at last arrived at an understanding of a difficult question. "Well, then, I can tell you that it's not a bit of good your looking for it, nor never will be. It's confiscated. Haven't you read the rules?"

"The rules, sir?" she echoed vaguely in a faint voice. "No; Miss Jones and Miss Meridman told me that I ought to read them, but I haven't had time yet really, I haven't, sir. But, oh, sir, what have they got to do with my losing the photograph?"

Her employer snorted. It was one of his axioms that he would rather deal with rogues than fools any day, and this girl was evidently a fool.

"Look here," he said, seizing her arm, and drawing her with him down the last few steps of the stairway. "I'll show you, come along here."

He led her to the cashier's box at the back of one of the two shops, and there, outside the door, he showed her a long paper pasted up. At the top of it was written conspicuously the heading—"Rules of the House." There were a formidable number of them; supposing that each paragraph represented a separate rule, there must have been at least ninety-five. In point of fact, Maggie saw when Mr. Jeffery stooped the candle nearer the paper that the number attached to the last rule was ninety-five. Mr. Jeffery at this moment ran a coarse forefinger down the list, and presently stopped it about midway, keeping it pointing significantly at a certain paragraph the while he read out its decisive sentences:

"Bedrooms must be left tidy. No pictures, photos, etc., allowed to disfigure the walls. Any one so doing will be charged with the repairs. A fine of threepence will be made for each article so left."

"You'd better find time, some night after the shop is shut, to write out a copy of those rules, so that you can take it home to read on Sunday," said the shop proprietor by way of good-night as he let her out by the private door.

Thus launched upon her almost cruelly difficult homeward way, Maggie Maitland stood still for a moment, looking strangely and helplessly about her. It occurred to her that if Mr. Jeffery thought it so disgraceful for her to be out, he might in pity have invited her to remain under the shelter of his and Mrs. Jeffery's roof till morning.

Alice would be in bed, of course; but the old adoptive mother, who was the only mother Maggie had ever known, would surely be sitting up watching for her, and would as surely have begun to feel anxious about her. She thought, with a cruel heart stab, that if this little picture lost today should never be restored to her, she and Mrs. Maitland might never be able to get another to replace it. Or, at least, they might never be able to afford to get another until her lover, Alexander Dare, should come home. And that might not be for many weeks to come.

"What's the use of trying to get home?" she was saying to herself over and over again in a very anguish of suffering and despair. "I can't! I can't! My feet feel like lead—except that they ache so much. It will be much better to sit down on the door step here close up against the door, and wait till the morning comes."

If she had been utterly alone in the world, utterly friendless, and with no one but herself to disgrace by any foolish or cowardly or sinful action, she might have done this. But two thoughts restrained her. What would that poor, bent, old woman think, what agonies of fear would she suffer, if three o'clock and four o'clock in the morning came without bringing her the sound of the young feet that she loved on the rickety stair, and the sight of the young face that she loved looking in at the door?

This was the first thought that kept the exhausted and almost despairing girl from sinking down to pass the night on her employer's doorstep. And the second thought which restrained her was the remembrance of that letter from her lover, whose pages full of comfort and sweetness her eyes had not yet scanned.

The night was a good one for walking; it was at once very damp and very cold—cold with a raw coldness which knows as well as frost does how to pierce to the very marrow of the poorly fed and poorly clad. It would have been a very bad night for resting on a doorstep. A cold, sleety rain lashed the pavement. Already, after having been out in it only ten minutes or so, Maggie felt that her clothes were soaked through, chilling her to the bone.

Two hours passed as she labored on. The whole way was a struggle. Pain! She was aching in every limb, and the soreness of her feet—her feet, which so long had been weary and cruelly rubbed by her wet shoes—became almost intolerable at those times when she stopped the walking that helped her to forget it. And the terror had been continual, increasing always in the dark spaces between the yellow gas lamps and in the shadows cast by the angles of houses.

Staggering across Trafalgar square, she tried to reach one of the seats, but failed, and sank down instead upon the wet pavement striking her head against the hard stone.

Five minutes or had elapsed when a policeman strode up to her. The beam of his bull's eye had revealed her to him as he prowled around the fountain in quest, presumably, of disorderly characters.

"Hullo! young woman, what are you doing here lying down drunk like this in the rain?" he inquired.

"She's not drunk, constable, she has fainted," a voice said close at hand. Maggie did not hear this voice, but she was told afterwards of what had passed.

"Poor girl! she looks very ill."

FOOD THE ANCIENTS LIKED

NOT SO VERY MUCH DIFFERENT FROM OURS.

Cooks Held in High Esteem After the Simple Life Had Been Pushed Into Shade.

The Ancients, by whom we mean the Greeks and Romans, ate very much the same food that we eat today, and with the same appetite. They looked upon the process, perhaps, with an eye of greater ceremony. In Homeric times the gods took their share of every banquet, and in a later age of the placing of the guests, the conduct of the symposium, were of equal import with the choice of the meats and the wines.

"He dines not who eats alone," was a maxim which never fell upon dishonor. That we should notice similarity rather than difference, as we look backward, is but natural. The craving for well-cooked food is wholesomely human, and if the palate grows more delicate as the appetite becomes less gross the change is not peculiar to this country or that. As in poetry, so in food, the love of simplicity is the proof of a golden, if primitive, age.

The heroes of Homer, for instance, were not nice feeders. They seem to have had the healthy plain food and plenty of it. They had neither butchers nor cooks. They slaughtered their own beasts and prepared their meat as well as they could. They had little taste for fish, which they ate only when there was nothing else to be had and they looked upon game as no better than the food of necessity. Nor were vegetables pleasing to their sturdy palates. Meat, bread and wine were their staple fare, and they asked for no accessories. Pork and mutton and goats' flesh they ate willingly.

Pork Was Highly Esteemed.

Indeed, the beast which, to some is still unclean, was very much to the taste of the Greeks, and was highly esteemed at their banquets unto the end. Athenaeus writes in lyrical strains of a pig that once was served to him and his friends, the half of which was carefully roasted, the other half boiled gently, as if it had been steamed, and the whole stuffed with thrushes and other birds. But best of all the Homeric heroes liked beef, cut into pieces and grilled upon spits. And it was only on occasions of sacrifice that their desires were wholly satisfied. Though the gods, to be sure, claimed the daintiest morsels, there was enough left to appease the stoutest hunger. Nor did they demand any adornment to such feasts as these save fruit.

As the years passed the Greeks grew daintier and more critical of their food. The three meals which broke their day were not unlike those which still obtain. Their first breakfast was simple enough, consisting of bread dipped in neat wine. Their luncheon was taken about noon, and their dinner was as late as ours. Spoons and forks they knew not, nor tablecloths nor napkins; but, if their service was bad, in the fifth century luxury had already invaded Athens.

There is no better proof of the delicacy of the Greek palate than the honor in which cooks were held. They plied their trade with the greatest freedom, and, not being attached to this master or that, they were called in by the rich on occasions of brilliant festivity.

What wonder then the cook's was a respectable profession, becoming a free man!

When we turn to Rome we find the same progress from simplicity to gluttony.

The Ancient Roman,

like the Scot, grew strong upon porridge. Puls was the staple of his diet. But foreign victories brought foreign manners, and luxury made an easy conquest of Rome, which presently adopted the three meals of the Greeks, to divide the day. In the early morning the Roman was satisfied with bread, dried fruits and cheese. Then at noon came the prandium, which consisted, in simple households, of the broken meats from yesterday's dinner table, with a pleasant addition of eggs, vegetables and wine.

But it was the cena to which the epicure looked forward as the very climax of his day, when he might take his ease and indulge his fancy. The cena, indeed, was an elaborate meal, which followed a rigidly prescribed plan. First came the gustus, devised to stimulate appetite, not to satisfy hunger. It consisted of an elaborate array of what we call hors d'oeuvre, and yet resembled the loaded side tables of Sweden and Russia more nearly than the modest dishes of France. There were shellfish and eggs and vegetables.

At the famous banquet of Trimalchio, which, it should be remembered, was not merely a banquet, but a burlesque, and was given by a multi-millionaire, as we should call him to-day, the gustus would have served the most of men for a dinner. A donkey of Corinthian bronze held two baskets of olives, white on one side, black on the other. Then there were dormice covered with honey and poppy seed, hot sausages on a silver grill, and beneath them damsons and pomegranate seeds. But a Roman dined with Trimalchio as rarely as with Lucullus, and the freedman's fancy was separate and his own.

After the gustus came the regular courses (fercula they are called), which might be three, or even seven, in the houses of epicures.

The Satirists and Historians, as we know, condemn the extravagance, which vastly increased under the empire, and which bade the wealthy Romans send for their priceless delicacies to the ends of the earth. Satire had no more effect than sumptuary laws, and the banquets of rich patricians and wealthy freedmen are legendary. First came the fish, for poor as for rich a necessity of the dinner. Sea-barbel and the turbot of Ravenna were the favorites and the haddock was not disdained.

Oysters were as highly prized at Rome as in modern London, and were brought by the wealthy from Britain to be fattened in the Lucrine Lake. Of the birds, the chief in esteem were fowls and peacocks, and field fares were as eagerly sought for in Rome as in the Athens of Aristophanes.

But no banquet at Rome was complete without a wild boar, whose entrance upon the table, roasted whole, marked the highest moment of the ceremonial feast. Petronius has described the pomp of its coming with a vast deal of circumstance. "A tray was brought in with a wild boar of the largest size upon it, wearing a cap of freedom, with two little baskets wove of palm twigs hanging from his tusks, one full of dry dates and the other of fish. Round it lay suckling pigs made of Simnel cake with their mouths to the teats, thereby showing that we had a sow before us."

So valiant a beast, freed because the guests of yesterday had sent him away untasted, deserved the ministration of no mean carver. And a big bearded man in a spangled hunting coat plunged a great knife into his side, and as the knife entered, out there flew

A Large Number of Thrushes.

It was a fantastic spectacle, and suggests not the banquet of an epicure, but what the newspapers of today call a freak dinner.

And the Romans, no less than the Greeks, proved their love of the pig by the preference they showed for sausage and black puddings. For the rest they esteemed a hare, a goat, or a dormouse that had been fed on chestnuts as rare dainties, and they finished their feasts with a fine array of pastry and fruit. Some there were who praised the simple life, but we may assume that Horace, when he declared his hatred of Persian apparatus, was expressing no more than the remorse of a jaded palate.

Yet if we compare the luxury of modern times with the luxury of Rome, we shall observe but few differences. We do not, like the Romans, recline at our meals; we do not observe the ceremonies of the triclinium, we are more sensitive in keeping clean our hands, and prefer forks to fingers, but the taste of man has not greatly changed in 2,000 years, and if it could be our good fortune to dine with Lucullus, his table would cause us no confusion and but small surprise.

AFRICAN MARKSMEN.

Where Cross-Bows Shoot as Sure as Guns.

The proficiency of the African cross-bow men amazed the Duke of Mecklenburg, who wondered how the weapon of William Tell found its way into the Bangandu country. But there it was, handed down from a dim antiquity which the natives were unable to reveal. Several of the hunting tribes use the weapon, and some of the marksmen are so skilled that they can bring down a high soaring bird with the same sure action of the man with the gun.

"Nothing is done to the arrows used for killing birds," writes the duke in his recently published work, "From the Congo to the Niger and the Nile," "but for shooting monkeys they are invariably dipped in strophanthus juice, a poison which kills them almost immediately."

The duke was at the head of the German Central African expedition of 1910 and 1911, undertaken to supplement the work of the expedition of 1907 and 1908. Though the book makes a marvellous contribution to our knowledge of Central African fauna and flora, anthropology, ethnology and meteorology, and shows the perfection of scientific research, to the layman there are portions as interesting as the most imaginative fiction. One at times, despite the unvarnished narration, is reminded of the wild African stories of Rider Haggard. Even a chapter bearing the extremely practical title of "Research Work at Molundu" is enlivened by a vivid description of an attack on the expedition by "driver ants."

Science is not pursued on easy or comfortable terms in these wilds. It is a moment of real terror when the negroes raise the cry of "Ants, massa, ants!"

"All the spiders, lizards, and, above all, the cockroaches, sought safety in flight, and the boys screamed whenever they were bitten. Our combined efforts succeeded in diverting the main attack in another direction. The infuriated insects clung for some time to the roof, hanging in bunches to the palm fronds of which it was composed, and dropping one by one to the ground. Woe betide the unwary individual who received an ant in the neck!"

That Soothing Stimulant.

Sir Lauder Brunton some years ago made interesting researches in regard to the effect of alcohol on the system in health and disease. Amongst other things, he discovered that the idea that cold may be warded off by means of spirits is nothing but a myth, and gave the case of a party of mountaineers who had to camp for the night at a high altitude. Some members of the party partook liberally of alcohol before getting into their sleeping bags, others took just a little, while some of the party drank none at all. The following morning every one of the first group was dead. Those who had taken a little on the previous night woke feeling cold and miserable, whilst those who had left themselves in the hands of nature awoke feeling refreshed and well, though they had been the last to fall asleep. When a stimulant is required owing either to cold or fatigue, a tumbler of milk, as hot as can be sipped, is the best thing that can be taken.

His Indorsement.

The late Lord Roberts once sent his orderly to the bank to cash a check, says Pearson's Weekly, and the clerk wanted it indorsed. "What for?" demanded the soldier. "Well, it's the rule, and I can't pay you the money until you indorse it," he was told. "Oh, all right!" grumbled the messenger. So he took back the check and bit the end of a pen in deep meditation for a minute or two. Then he wrote this: "I beg to say that I have known Lord Roberts for several years, and he has proved himself times without number, to be as brave as a lion, but always kindly considerate to those who serve under him. And I have, therefore, great pleasure in respectfully indorsing his check."

HOW HABITS MAKE WRINKLES

Different Causes Are Given for Their Formation.

There are different causes for wrinkles, which are not entirely due to old age. Habits of thought reflect themselves in the face, and if persisted in create wrinkles through the repeated exercise of certain muscles in fixing the expression of the features. A constantly fretful or worrisome contraction of the skin of the forehead will cause wrinkles there independent of the age of the person.

In persons of a jolly, laughing nature the lines running outward and downward from the eye, caused by laughter, will become more or less fixed.

Wrinkles running across the root of the nose, between the eyes, indicate concentrated habits of thought in general.

An over-exercise of decisiveness or determination will make permanent lines from the sides of the nostrils to the outer edges of the mouth.

The natural cause of wrinkles as they come with advancing years, however, has nothing to do with the expression of the mind in the face. It is caused by the lack of nourishment for the skin to keep the circulation of the blood up to its youthful strength. As we grow older we lose the fat that has accumulated under our skin, and which is due to an imperfectly adjusted circulation in all parts of the body.

When fat accumulates it makes the skin grow larger, and when the fat disappears with advancing age the skin is too large, and in the act of contracting the wrinkles are formed.

ABSENT TREATMENT

Before the open window of a private room in Westbourne Hospital sat Douglas Shale—looking dreamily out to sea.

He was propped up by pillows, and in his eyes was that calm look so often seen in those who have but recently faced death at close quarters. Presently, into his dreaming came the sound of the door being opened, and the pleasant tinkle of a spoon against china.

It was Mary Glynn—known to Douglas as "Nurse"—with the tiny ration of milk-pudding that was mis-called his lunch. For Douglas was only just recovering from enteric fever, and the doctor was adamant in the matter of meals—so was Mary.

"More food, indeed!" she chaffed him. "That's just like you men to think of nothing but eating. I'd rather have twenty women to look after than one of you—so there!"

"You and the doctor are a couple of bullies, nurse!" smiled the patient, who was really a very good patient indeed, taking the bowl from her. "But just you wait till I'm out of here, that's all! I'll have the very greatest blow-out any man ever had; and I'll make you and the doctor come, too, just to heap coals of fire on your wicked heads."

"What you do when you leave here," answered the girl, "doesn't matter to me. If you choose to over-eat yourself, well, I can't help it. But if you think I'm going to let you have a single crumb of solid food now, well, you're mistaken, Mr. Ungrateful!"

"Now, look here, nurse," pleaded the starving young man, "I don't believe it would do me any harm at all. Just as an experiment, give me one little bit of bread, and if——"

"Now, then," exclaimed Mary, "if you're not careful I'll pack you off to bed again—and how would you like that?"

They both laughed. Then he handed back the all too-easily emptied bowl.

"Nothing more for hours and hours!" groaned Douglas, in mock misery, falling back on his pillows.

"That's a fact" said Mary, briskly, as she made him more comfortable. "But here's something that may help to pass the time away," she continued, holding out a bulky envelope.

"Why, it's from Audry, my sister," he exclaimed in a pleased voice. "I suppose you told her that she might write to me at last?"

Mary nodded.

"Well, that was decent of you, anyway. Perhaps you're not so hard-hearted as you pretend to be."

"Perhaps not" she replied, laughing as she left the room.

Douglas, being the under manager of a large firm of wapping agents in the North, was obliged to live in Westbourne, many miles from his home on the outskirts of London, where dwelt Audrey and their widowed mother, so that the brother and sister had always plenty of news to send each other.

Audrey's letter began with family news, and the latest reports of their mother's health. From that she went on to give him an account of the doings of their relations and more intimate friends, and then—for Audrey was nothing if not thorough in the letter-writing line—related the stray happenings of the neighborhood.

"Oh, yes, and the house next to ours is let at last!" wrote his sister. "They are charming people named Vardon, a father, a mother, and one daughter, the sweetest girl I have ever seen. Of course, I hoped that her name would be Dolly—and it is! Dolly Vardon is just twenty, the same age as I am, and sings rippingly—contralto. She has the loveliest brown eyes you ever saw, and simply heaps of glorious hair—a sort of old gold color. Oh, Douglas, do get well quickly, as I do so want you to meet her, and she wants to meet you, too! I have told her all about you, and have told her what a dear old brother you are...She is the sweetest thing!"

Douglas put the letter down and once more looked over the sea. The letter made him think of his mother, of Audrey, and—yes, and—Dolly Vardon. It was unusual for his sister to be so enthusiastic about anyone, but the fair Dolly certainly sounded attractive.

He rang the bell by his chair, and when Mary came in, asked if he might write a letter.

"Why, we have cheered up," she said, smiling down at him. "Yes, you've been a good boy, so I'll let you write your note—only a note, mind!"

She left the room and returned with a writing-block and pencil.

"Don't go stooping over your writing, now!" she admonished him, and Douglas smiled dreamily to hear the note of possession in the girl's pretty voice.

Left to himself he began to write, and was disgusted to find how weak and shaky his hand was. However, he struggled on, concluding with the following:

"Your friend, Dolly Vardon—how nice of her to have a name like that!—must be something very wonderful, and I am looking forward to meeting her." Of all voices, I think contralto is the most beautiful. I wish you could bring her here to tea one day! But as that's impossible, I must get well and come home as soon as I can."

The writing made him tired, and when Mary returned, she found him leaning back on his pillows, with his eyes closed. She gently stroked his forehead with her cool young hand, and after a little he raised himself up and asked her to read to him.

As she bent over the book Douglas, soothed by her voice, found his thoughts wandering to London and to Dolly Vardon with the old gold hair. Mary Glynn had a wealth of hair too, but it was as black as night—as black as only an Irish girl's knows how to be.

Two days later came a hurriedly written note from Audrey.

"Am just off to a matinee with Dolly. I showed her your letter and we both nearly cried to see how old and shaky your writing looks. While she was in my room yesterday she suddenly said: 'That's your brother's photograph, isn't it?' And it was! I asked her how she knew—for you know you're not a bit like any of us—and she said she just felt it must be! Isn't it funny! I get quite excited when I think of you meeting each other!"

Douglas was, of course, still in his chair, but he felt his strength beginning to come back. Taking the writing-pad on his knee, he answered his sister's note:

"It certainly was curious that Miss Vardon should have picked my photo out of the gallery of portraits—mostly of men, by the way that you keep in your room! Couldn't you get me a portrait of her to cheer me up? I wish she could come and sing to me—it's horrid being crocked up like this. But I'm getting better every day."

Dolly Vardon! There was a atmosphere of romance round the name that appealed to him. He felt that he knew her quite well already, and he was filled with gratitude to the girl for having helped him to pass the long days away. One day he would meet her and thank her. She was evidently an unpalsive girl and possessed ready sympathies. She would be a splendid friend for his sister or anyone.

Then, as was the custom, Mary Glynn came in and read to him, gave him his alleged supper and packed him off to bed.

Three days passed without any letter, and Douglas felt that he had a grievance. Then came a hurried note from his sister. After giving him the family news—which, by the way, he skipped shamelessly—she wrote:

"Dolly is now swinging in the hammock under the old chestnut tree at the end of the garden, and singing to herself. She makes a beautiful picture. She says she would rather not send a photo of herself as she always comes out such a fright. It isn't true, but that's what she says.

"You remember when you got a cane for making verses? Well, I lent them to Dolly to read the other day. When she had finished them she said that she was sure you are just the sort of man she has been wanting to meet—only please don't ever tell her that I said so! And don't get swelled head either! She came in this morning with a large bunch of roses, and asked me to send them to 'her poet' with her best wishes for his quick recovery. Good bye, old boy—so glad you are getting really better."

And that was all.

Just then Mary came in with a parcel containing the flowers which, when he had unpacked them, he handed to her to arrange in a rose-bowl. There was a label attached. "To the poet, from Dolly Vardon."

"And who is Dolly Vardon, may I ask?" said Mary, smiling at him.

"Oh, just a friend of my sister's," answered Douglas. "Will you read to me, old girl!" For the two were good friends by now.

"Of course I will," said Mary, sitting down beside him and opening the book. "But you never told me you were a poet!"

During the next two weeks Douglas regained a good deal of his former strength, and at last, to his great joy, was allowed almost normal meals.

Dolly Vardon and he were quite intimate by this time. He had even written to her and had received in return a note enclosed in a little volume of poems she had sent him. It is always nice to make a new friend, and if that friend happens to be a beautiful girl it is not exactly a misfortune, is it!

Then came one Monday morning when the doctor told him that he might arrange to leave on the following Wednesday. He wrote to Audrey telling her the great news.

"Now, why," he wrote, "should not you and Dolly come up here and take me home? She would be a jolly companion for you. You could get the train that reaches here in the evening. I'm afraid they won't let you in the hospital at that time, but there is quite a nice little hotel near the station where you could both spend the night. Send me a wire."

The next afternoon, to his surprise and great delight, came a telegram:

"Will be with you to breakfast on Wednesday morning. — Audrey, Dolly."

When, at last, Wednesday morning came round Douglas was up in good time packing all the last little things that are so hard to remember—razors, and so on—and was quite excited to think that at last he was going to meet his golden-haired little friend.

It had been arranged, that Mary, Audrey, Dolly Vardon and he should all breakfast together in his room, and the last touches had just been given to the table—which was decorated with one of Dolly Vardon's bunches of flowers—when his sister was announced.

She ran in and threw her arms round his neck and kissed him again and again. Mary stood by the still open door looking expectantly, and with flushed cheeks down the passage.

When Douglas had introduced his sister to Mary a puzzled look came over his face. Where was Dolly Vardon?

"But er I say, Audrey, old girl, what have you done with Dolly—er Miss Vardon? Surely you haven't left her waiting about outside?"

"Oh, Douglas—she began.

"What is it, old girl? Anything wrong?"

"Oh, you won't be angry with me, will you? But, Douglas, it's all that is, she—I mean I made it all up!"

"Made what up?"

"The flowers, and the letters, and the messages, and everything!"

"Everything!"

"Yes. Dolly Vardon and all! Say you're not cross, Douglas! I thought it would help to pass the time away, dear!"

"And so it did, old girl!" said Douglas, a little ruefully. Then he burst into a roar of laughter, in which Mary joined. "And now I've got something to tell you!" he continued, putting his arm round Mary's waist.

"How do you like that ring, Audrey!" he asked, holding out Mary's left hand, on the third finger of which sparkled a single diamond.

"Oh, Douglas, you mean thing!" said Audrey, throwing her arms round them both. "Why didn't you tell me before! Now I see why you aren't cross with me!"

"Cross with you!" scoffed Douglas. "I never really cared for golden hair. And you ought to hear Mary sing!" — London Answers.

The Smoking Store.

One day, when the English statesman, Benjamin Disraeli, was walking through his estate, he found one of his tenants eating dinner by the roadside, although his house was very close by.

"Well, Henry," asked the kindly landowner, "why are you eating out here by the road?"

"Oh, sir," stammered the tenant, greatly embarrassed, "I can't eat inside because—because the stove smokes so much. And——"

"Well, that's too bad," said Disraeli. "I will see what the trouble is at once."

And before the tenant could utter a word, Disraeli hastened toward the house. But scarcely had he opened the door when a shrill woman's voice piped out, "You take yourself right out of here, you lazy good-for-nothing!"

Very much perplexed, the statesman then returned to his waiting tenant by the roadside. He put his hand on the man's shoulder in a kindly fashion, and said, "Cheer up, Henry, my boy! My stove at home sometimes smokes, too."

THE ONLY PLACE OF ESCAPE.

RESPECT FOR BRITISH NAVY

THE GERMAN SAILORS DIFFER FROM SOLDIERS.

Feverish Preparations Going On at Kiel For Expected Battle.

The New York Tribune publishes an article from a staff correspondent, dated Kiel, Germany, in which he says:

A day with the Kaiser's navy seeing the feverish race against time in the huge shipyards and the imperial torpedo works; watching the gun crews of a German Dread nought beat a whipped into shape by enthusiastic coaches" for the last great death grapple with the British (which they were all sure was to come), and they hoped soon), witnessing the final tuning up of the newest and largest German sub marine, whose boyish commander modestly said he wanted to bag a "Lion" or a Tiger or an "Ajax," though he would take a shot at a King George if nothing better offered—such was the eye opening experience.

Poking Fun at Churchill.

Judging by the two score or more officers who were "sampled" in conversation, the young German navy has not had its head turned by its initial successes, but it is undeniably in high spirits and full of whimsical humor at the expense of the English. As a significant illustration of the new naval morale, one of the officers with mock seriousness scribbled an invitation on the back of a menu card to come and take part in "a little submarine practice, during which at least four English cruisers or better will be sunk with wind and weather permitting." "We would not think of offering you less than four because three is already an old story," he laughingly explained, adding that "wind" was metaphorical for Winston Churchill.

New Submarine.

The whimsical invitation was accepted, and while "wind and weather did not permit," a very thorough inspection was afforded of the new super-dreadnought submarine U-32. Of about 1,000 tons and nearly 200 feet long, it carries a complement of thirty officers and men and six torpedoes.

Admire English Navy.

It was particularly striking, however, that among the naval officers and sailors one did not find the bitter hatred of England and the English which one so invariably meets among army officers and soldiers in the field and landsmen generally. The official German report of the destruction of the Audacious had just become known in Kiel, but there was no gloating and no celebration, liquid or otherwise. The officers at once recalled that the Audacious had been a member of the visiting British squadron during Kiel week in June—"a splendid ship"—but made no other comment.

A lieutenant commander said to the Tribune correspondent: "We consider it an honor to fight against the English. The English naval officer is always a gentleman. But the Japs—treacherous, yellow curs—just let them once come. We have no use for them. The English, the French and even the Russian, we can respect as opponents, but not the Japs."

Tuning Up Reservists.

A visit was next paid to one of their best dreadnoughts, the Markgrof. All the gun crews were being driven at top speed, some in pantomime shadow practice, others with real shells. About five hours a day of gun drill, as many of the men are reservists, thirty to thirty-four years old, and need plenty of work to take the kinks out of them. They look like a particularly fine lot of men, and went at the work as if they were playing a game.

A first lieutenant, who proved to have an American wife, in addition to a good American accent, invited the American visitor to his forward turret, where he proudly put his two 12-inch guns through their paces. "An English Dreadnought is about seven miles away," he suggested, then blew his tin whistle and the gun crews stood at attention; then for the next ten minutes pandemonium reigned in the 12-inch turret—all make-believe, but the men went to it as if it were the real thing.

Shot Every 20 Seconds.

A touch of realism was added when one of the 12-inch guns jammed and when the lieutenant shouted the last desperate order, given when the whole gun crew has been put out of action, and from below a fresh lot of gunners swarmed up to take their places. "I can fire a shot every twenty seconds that is, each gun every forty seconds," the lieutenant explained.

Perhaps most interesting of all was the torpedo practice, "under battle conditions." To save time the water was not pumped out of the torpedo tubes before reloading, as in peace practice, but allowed to flood the room, inches deep. Here, too, the men were being driven along at high pressure and were "clocked" in the fast time of 1 minute 5 seconds for swinging a torpedo down from the ceiling (where spare torpedoes were fastened), ramming it into the torpedo tube and making ready to fire.

Busy in Navy Yard.

The correspondent was also permitted to make a tour of the huge navy yard, where construction work is being pushed day and night, 6,000 men working by day and 3,000 at night. It was already dark, and the work of turbine and boiler building and so forth was being carried on by the light of only a few small "interns." The Kaiser's navy yard and all his Imperial Majesty's workshops reminded one strongly of London by night, and one was not surprised when the superintendent explained that the lack of illumination was a precautionary measure against a possible visit of hostile airmen—though none has come so far," he added.

Utmost significance can be attached to the interesting fact that work is not being pushed on those fighting ships under construction which could not possibly be finished under a year, while the main effort is being directed to those which will be ready fighting trim in three months or less.

Have Ships at Sea.

The English will find German warships in the North Sea now if they will go in and look for them," our officer remarked.

"The British numerical superiority is chiefly in the smaller ships," another said. "In Dreadnoughts we are not at such a great disadvantage. But mere superiority in tonnage and metal-throwing ability will not be the deciding factors in the great battle. We Germans do not fear this advantage of the British." But none of them would hazard a guess as to when "the big battle" would take place.

A LITTLE RIFLE PRACTICE.

How Soldiers Amuse Themselves on the Firing Line.

An amusing little story, which shows how strongly Tommy Atkins objects to being dull, comes from the Asane.

At one time, during the course of that long-drawn-out battle, there came a lull in the firing, and the British soldiers began to find things growing monotonous.

The Germans immediately started potting at it, and our Tommies signalled the results of the firing, cheering vociferously every time a bull was scored.

When at last the improvised target had been almost shot away, and they had to pull it down, imagine the surprise of our soldiers when they saw a duplicate pop up above the German trenches!

The same thing happened. The Germans signaled the results of the British marksmanship, and loudly cheered each time they had to signal a bull.

Row Avoided.

He (disagreeably)—What the mischief is the matter with this dinner?

She (mildly)—I cooked it, dear.

He—Well, I was wondering what made it so much better than usual.

DRIVING "THE DEVIL'S CAR."

Baron Ciergleys Tells of His Exciting Experiences.

Baron Ciergleys, who has been serving with distinction in the Belgian Army, having charge of the first armored car used in the war, has just returned to his home at Great Chart, near Ashford, Kent, England, for rest and recuperation. The baron has had many stirring adventures, and was wounded in three places during an encounter near Lille, when the driver of the car, Prince Baudouin de Ligne, and the baron's cousin, Count de Villermont, were killed. For his bravery Baron Ciergleys has been awarded the Chevalier de l'Ordre de Leopold.

The baron, profiting by experiences, is now engaged in designing an armored car that will adequately protect the chauffeur. He proposes providing a periscope (similar to that used by submarines), also foot mirrors, that will reveal to the chauffeur the whereabouts of the enemy. The baron told of his experiences recently in a London newspaper, as follows:

"We had a terrible time near Lille when Prince Louis de Baudouin was killed. We had three armored cars, and suddenly we found ourselves in an ambush of 450 of the German infantry. They fired upon us, and we replied with our machine guns and rifles, but the number was too great. Six of our party were killed outright, one was missing and supposed to be killed, and one is recovering with two bullets in his head and arm, while I was wounded in the head, arm and leg. My cousin, Count de Villermont, was shot dead as he was clambering into my car.

"My gun was shot out of my hand, but I had the satisfaction of firing the last shot before the enemy, finding that their ambush had failed, had retreated. I shot the major. Once we were motoring from Antwerp to Lille, and suddenly found a rope-cable across the road, tied to trees on either side. It was an awkward trap. The enemy, having seen us coming, thought that we should have to dismount from our armored car to remove the rope, and thus be captured. The trap did not succeed, because I fired consecutively at each spot where the rope was drawn taut around the tree. The rope was cut, and all into the road, and we drove off after giving a few shots more to the fleeing Germans.

"Upon my departure from Ostend I had the satisfaction of all communication with the Uhlans, killing seventeen as they were riding in, before I made adieu to my armored car, which is well known to the Uhlans, who call it 'The Devil's car.'"

DOGS IN WAR.

Were Used For Pursuing and Killing Fugitives.

"Dogs of war" is a phrase which once meant a thing as real as the warhorse. Dogs have played their part in battles and campaigns, and in the old wars between England and Scotland dogs were used by both combatants for pursuing and killing fugitives after a defeat.

It is related that Wallace and Bruce each had close escapes from capture by English bloodhounds. Bruce is said to have thrown the English dog off the scent by the now known expedient of wading up a stream far enough to baffle his pursuers, and Wallace evaded the hounds by having recourse to a trick more or less common in those strenuous times of killing a follower and leaving the body in the dogs' path for them to come upon. The dogs finding a body, believed that their task was done, and discontinued the hunt.

In the history of the wars of the middle ages one finds reference to the use of big dogs against cavalry for the purpose of throwing the horses into confusion, and not alone for causing panic but casualties, for these fierce canine partisans were clothed in coats of mail studded with spikes and having scythes fitted to their harness.

Instances are recorded where war dogs with firebrands fastened to their coats of mail have been set on an enemy's camp with destructive results. Henry VIII. must have hundreds of them in military ways because in an English history it is written that he offered the use of 10,000 auxiliaries and 1,000 war dogs to King Charles V. of Spain to aid that monarch in his war with Francis I.

In the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when the Earl of Essex entered Ireland for the purpose of suppressing insurrection there, his army was accompanied by 100 bloodhounds.

A Squelcher.

He (feeling his way)—Would you get married if you were me?

She—I don't believe I could—if I were you.

Fell Out Again.

"I thought you said Jack fell in love with Alice at first sight."

"And so he did; but you see he took a second look."

The leading aspirants for the Warden ship are all returned in their respective municipalities—Reeves McNabb of Walkerton, McCannel of Saugeen and Izzard of Port Elgin.

Brant Tp ratepayers decided up their votes very equally for the two candidates for reeve. Had there been another vote out he probably would have plumped it for McCallum and made it a tie.

PETER EASON

The aptitude of the Master's declaration that "The son of man cometh as a thief in the night" was brought home with startling suddenness to the minds of the people of this community when it became known on Sunday morning that Mr Peter Eason, a mild and respected resident of this neighborhood had been called to his eternal reward. The deceased, who was in his 72nd year, had been in splendid health, had been about his usual work on Saturday, had walked home from his farm at Gillies Hill and on retiring remarked that he felt fine. In the morning on his not appearing at the usual time his daughter entered his room and was shocked to find his lifeless body, the end having apparently come some hours before. Death was due to heart failure. The subject of this sketch was a Scotch Canadian, born in Dummer Tp, county of Peterboro, and almost half a century ago came to Bruce Co., working at different places for a couple of years, afterwards purchasing from the late Hugh McIntyre a sixty acre farm where by hard work and good farming the wilderness was transformed into one of the best farms in the township. The deceased was a man well known in the township, was of sterling honesty, without guile, an ideal neighbor and always ready to act the good Samaritan to the stranger who found himself in trouble. Business of any kind entrusted to his care was attended to with dispatch. Punctual to keep an appointment, he never missed the annual S S meeting and was for twenty years in succession appointed chairman. He took a deep interest in farmer's rights, was a grange as long as the institution continued business in this locality, and was the first president of Carlise Farmers' Club. In politics he was independent no party lines guiding the pencil that marked his ballot. Which ever party policy appeared to him as being nearest right got his support. He was a thorough temperance man and a strong supporter of the member for North Bruce. Mr Eason was twice married. His first wife was Sarah Tully, sister of the late Wm Tully, and his second wife was Margaret Kidd who predeceased him six years ago. He is survived by a family of four—John, Irwin, Sarah at home and Wm Eason, V.S. of Lemaine, Sask. The funeral to St Andrews cemetery on Tuesday was largely attended. The service at the house was conducted by Rev. Mr. Wilson of Varts, assisted by Rev. Howatt of Salem. Of the former's church he was always a faithful attendant. To afflicted family we extend the heartfelt sympathy of the community. Of the nine brothers and three sisters of deceased, only two brothers are now living—David of Paisley, and Richard of Haliburton Co.

DISTRICT SEED GROWERS' ASSOCIATIONS

Superior seed stocks produced from time to time by Experiment Stations may be multiplied for commerce under the direction of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association. The growing seed crops of members are inspected and reported on generally by officers of Provincial Departments of Agriculture. The cleaned and graded seed which comes to up the standard—no impurities and 95 per cent germination—is inspected and sealed in sacks under registration number by officers in the employ of the Association. But the quantity of registered seed though increasing yearly is yet relatively small, hence the recent organizations or District Associations for Eastern and Western Ontario each under a directorate which includes a prominent grower of each kind of seed crop. These associations have grown out of committees of management of Provincial Seed Exhibitions at Guelph and Ottawa. They aim to assist individuals and organizations concerned in the production, exhibition and sale of high class farm and garden seeds through educational and advertising movements. Seed shall be sold under guarantee by the grower as to variety, purity and germination. R W Wade, Toronto, is Secretary-Treasurer for Western Ontario, and W H Smith, Athens, for Eastern Ontario.

THE DEATH OF THE OLD YEAR

Miserere! Toll the bell,
Let the earth send forth a knell
For a great soul takes his flight,
None knows whither, in the night—
Miserere!

Stretched upon his snowy bier,
Dying, lies the good old year,
And upon his midnight gale
All may hear his parting wail—
Miserere!

In the old king's checkered reign
There were mingled joy and pain;
Friends proved false, while foes were true,
Sinners many, saints a few—
Miserere!

There were hearts that suffered wrong,
Bore it bravely and were strong;
Hearts there were so black within
Satan wondered at their sin—
Miserere!

Garners full of fruitful store,
Measures pressed and running o'er;
Famine in the streets at night,
Dying dumb for bread for light—
Miserere!

Hung the church bells for the wed;
Tolled they also for the dead.
In one home a joy was born;
From another joy was torn—
Miserere!

Such earth's sorrow, such its sin,
All must end where they begin.
Snow which wraps the New Year's feet
Is the old year's winding sheet—
Miserere!

Now his spirit goeth fast;
Midnight hour will be his last.
To your knees, earth's scorn and weary—
Miserere! Miserere!
—Charlotte Beaumont Jarvis.

OLD YEAR ADIEU.

Old Father Time, with visage grim,
Marks finis on another year;
His harvest he has gathered in;
Thy swath was wide both far and near.

The strife of battle rages round
The ranks of fighters in the van,
But clashing arms and shouts resound
Of victor and of conquered man

The aged sire, with trembling hands
And hoary locks of silvery white,
Perceives the passing of the sands,
The sunset's glow, the clouds of night.

Mayhap there is a vacant chair
At home, but recently resigned—
A loved one gone above to wear
The crown of bliss by angels twined.

The path to glory may not lead
With roses strewn about the feet,
But hope and strive by word and deed
Some soul to cheer. The New Year greet!
—T. J. Dahey in Pittsburgh Dispatch.

Goodby, Old Year!

We laughed with you, we chatted with you,
The glow of fun we mantled with you,
While sitting side by side.
You made life bright,
Put out of sight
The griefs we had to hide.

We danced with you, we pranced with you,
While others too entranced with you
Just gladly prodded on
You lent a hand
At all we planned
We miss you now you're gone.

We dined with you, we plined with you,
And many, too, oft wined with you,
Old Tone, who went so fast.
You were a friend
Clear to the end
Your joys and woes are past.

We sighed with you, we cried with you,
And some they almost died with you.
'Tis hard to say goodbye
Your heart was warm
Through any cold storm.
We grieve that you should die.

WORLD'S GREATEST KIDNEY REMEDY

"Fruit-a-tives" Have Proved Their Value In Thousands of Cases

WONDERFUL RECORD OF A WONDERFUL CURE

Only Remedy That Acts On All Three Of The Organs Responsible For The Formation Of Uric Acid In The Blood.

Many people do not realize that the Skin is one of the three great eliminators of waste matter from the body. As a matter of fact, the Skin rids the system of more Urea (or waste matter) than the Kidneys. When there is Kidney Trouble, Pain In The Back and Acrid Urine, it may not be the fault of the kidneys at all, but be due to faulty Skin Action, or Constipation of the bowels.

"Fruit-a-tives" cures weak, sore, aching Kidneys, not only because it strengthens these organs but also because "Fruit-a-tives" opens the bowels, sweetens the stomach and stimulates the action of the skin.

"Fruit-a-tives" is sold by all dealers at 50c a box, 6 for $2.50, trial size, 25c, or will be sent postpaid on receipt of price by Fruit-a-tives Limited, Ottawa.

WORLD WIDE

Canada's Leading Literary Review. Established 1901.

"World Wide" is a weekly budget of the best articles and cartoons reproduced from the leading journals and reviews reflecting the current thought of the old and new world.

To the busy man who wishes to keep in touch with the World's great events "World Wide" is invaluable. Trained experts select for him the two dozen really best articles of the week from the world's best publications. Almost every article you wish to keep or send to a friend.

"World Wide" has found its place on the study table. Preachers, teachers, writers and thinkers generally, hail it as a most welcome companion. As a pleasant, loyal stimulant to the mind—"World Wide" has no peer at the price, no equal among the journals of the day. As economical as best. "World Wide" is a feast of reason—an intellectual treat.

Principal Peterson, LL.D., McGill University, says, "I am sure 'World Wide' ought to have a hearty prosperous career before it."

President Trotter, D.D., of Acadia University, N.S., says—"I look eagerly for your weekly collection of good things, and recommend that the paper warmly to my friends."

Prof. H Hoyt, West River, N.B., says, "World Wide' is a delight to me. Read every page."

J. S. Thomson, LL.D., Ottawa, says, "I take a good many papers, but 'World Wide' is the only one I read about skipping."

"World Wide" is splendid. Every issue you feel you would like to put away among your treasures."—Editor "Telegraph," Welland, Ont.

THE ALSIKE SITUATION

Ontario alsike seed is usually sold in large quantities to the European market. The demand from this source is now greatly reduced because of war conditions. Ontario growers should note that the present stability in prices is due to the much smaller production in the province this season. A big crop next year with continued war conditions might cause a heavy drop in the market. Ontario alsike growers would be well advised to save seed only from specially clean fields

—Local option was carried in five more Ontario municipalities on Monday—Holland Landing, Jarvis, Newbury, West Lorne and Harwich. Repeal votes were taken and local option sustained in Durham, Midland, Newmarket, Thornbury, Lakefield, Shallow Lake, Tara, Teeswater and Percy. Repeal did not carry anywhere.

The Boston Boy's Diversions.

"Emerson," said Mrs. Beaconstreet, "how did you comport yourself in the thoroughfare this morning with your new neighbors?"

"I fear, ma mere," replied Emerson, "that our actions were scarcely such as would much intensify our intellects. You see, he knows nothing of Auguste Comte, his parents have forbidden him Voltaire, he dislikes Mr. Shakespeare and his familiarity with chemistry and astronomy is superficial to a wonderful degree. So we made loud pico."—Beacon Courier.

A MODERN MIRACLE

A NEW YEAR'S STORY

It was the last day of the old year. London had recovered from its Christmas festivities—and their after effects—and was preparing to see the new year in.

In the misty hours of the December afternoon two young men were gazing through the windows of a Piccadilly club at the people who were hurrying up and down that thoroughfare.

"Well, Densham," said the younger and darker of the two, "are you meditating any lofty and noble resolutions for the new year?"

"I am afraid that is not much in my line," replied Lord Densham in a slightly affected tone. "But I am thinking of making a great alteration."

"Really! Are you going to change your tailor or only let your mustache grow?"

"Don't be flippant," said his lordship in quite a melancholy tone. "The fact is, Brierley, old boy, I'm going to get married." This was drawled out slowly and with a deep sigh, as though the speaker felt he was making some mighty self-sacrifice for humanity.

"I thought you looked jolly blue about something, but wherefore the gloom?" asked Brierley. "Nobody compels you."

"I have to marry in self defense," proceeded his lordship. "It is sickening to feel that you are being run after by all the girls and all their matchmaking mammas. But the worst of it is that I've fixed on two girls, and I can't for the life of me decide which to have."

"And who are the favored couple between whom Paris the Second has to judge?"

"One is Daisy Molyneux—the lively little thing with the blue eyes and the good figure, you know. Of course she is very jolly and awfully fond of me"—

"Yes, and the other?"

"Sibyl Castlemaine, your—er—second cousin, isn't she?"

"Do you think Sibyl cares for you?"

"I am afraid there is not much doubt of it, old man," said his lordship mournfully as he laughably stroked his clean shaven chin. "I used to fancy you were rather fond of her at one time, but of course it is impossible."

"Utterly!"

"Well, look here, old chap; I shouldn't ask everybody, but which of the two girls do you advise me to have? They're both nice, loving little girls, and it's an awful bore to have to choose. Which would you ask?"

"Well," said Brierly slowly, "I should advise you to have Daisy Molyneux."

"Thanks awfully, old chap. I only just needed an impartial opinion like yours to help me decide. I'll propose to Daisy tonight. She is going to be at Lady Virgan's dance, and so is Sibyl, so I can get it settled either way. Will you be there?"

"Yes, I expect so."

Lady Virgan's rooms presented a gay and brilliant scene that evening. To welcome the new year with dancing and revelry, with music and mirth, was typical of the giddy social whirl in which hostess and guests revolved.

Lord Densham arrived early. He was attired with his usual care and correctness, and he wore also an air of determination that suited him very well. It displayed the appearance of indifference and listlessness which usually made the hereditary legislator look fussy and flabby. He speedily discovered that both Daisy Molyneux and Sibyl Castlemaine had come, and he sought Miss Molyneux that he might acquaint her with the honor he proposed to do her.

It was considerably later when Cecil Brierley arrived. He was not in the best of spirits and did not intend to do much dancing. One of the first persons he noticed was his own cousin.

"What, Sibyl—you not dancing?"

"No; I haven't been here long."

"Shall we sit down somewhere until some one comes and claims you?"

"By all means. It is quite a long time since I've had the chance of talking to you, Cecil."

"Have you never heard of Tantalus?" asked her cousin as he led her to a secluded corner.

"Who was he? An ancient god, wasn't he?" replied Miss Castlemaine. "Was he a relative of Bacchus? The spirit decanters are named after him."

"No," said Cecil very seriously. "He was a young man who longed for a certain prize just out of the reach."

"And this is apropos of what?" inquired Sibyl.

"Tantalus would have been happier if his prize had been out of his sight as well as out of his reach. In order to escape the madness of Tantalus I have been letting my prize go out of sight. They are waltzing very nicely," he added, drawing her attention to one of the couples floating near them.

"Lord Densham and Daisy Molyneux?"

"Yes. Densham's a nice fellow, isn't he?"

"Yes, I suppose one would hardly call him shy or modest, would one?"

"When a fellow like that can choose any girl he likes—when he knows they are all like pretty apples asking to be plucked—it is enough to make him conceited."

"And other fellows jealous?" added Sibyl mischievously. "And I suppose none of the pretty apples can be strung enough to refuse to fall into his hand?"

"It would be a modern miracle if they did."

A little later Brierley was trying to soothe his feelings with a cigarette in the smoking room when Lord Densham came up to him.

"I say, old chap, a funny thing has happened. Daisy Molyneux has refused me."

"By Jove! Were any signs of insanity ever noticed in the family before?" asked Cecil.

"No, I believe not," answered the peer, failing, as usual, to see any sarcasm in the question. "I tried to point out to her what it meant, but she stuck to it. Nice little girl too."

"Well, I'm awfully sorry, Densham; really I am."

"It doesn't matter so very much. Miss Castlemaine is here, isn't she? You see, I can ask her and get it settled. I think I'll go find her. I'm rather sorry I wasted my time over that other silly girl. Anyway, it makes my choice much easier."

When Lord Densham suggested to Sibyl Castlemaine that they should sit the dance out in the conservatory she saw that he meant to propose to her, and his lordship perceived that under the circumstances there was nothing to be gained by beating about the bush, and so he quickly led up to the business he had come to negotiate.

"It is rather serious to be standing on the edge of a new year," he said. "Dear Miss Castlemaine, I want to be a better man in the future than in the past, and you, only you, can help me. What is needed to make my happiness complete, to crown all my hopes and perfect my manhood, is a woman's love. Sibyl—let me call you Sibyl, my love—will you be the woman? Will you marry me?"

In the seclusion of the conservatory he opened his arms a little as though he expected her to creep in, and he expanded his chest to receive the burden of the dainty little head that was to nestle gently on it. But it was a night of surprises.

"I am very sorry you should have asked me this, Lord Densham," said Sibyl gravely. "I am conscious of the vastness of the compliment, and I am not blind to the advantages of your offer, but I do not love you."

"You don't love me?" repeated his lordship in a tone of disappointment that had a suspicion of incredulity in it. "You don't love me! But surely that is only a matter of time. When you have seen more of me, when you know me better, Sibyl"—

"My decision would not alter, Lord Densham. Will you please take me back? I am engaged for the next dance."

With a wonderful smile on his lips, in which mortification, pity and surprise were blended, he politely offered her his arm and led her back to the ballroom. As they entered it they almost ran into Cecil Brierley. He was about to walk past them when Sibyl said:

Densham yielded her up with his customary smile.

They were about to join the dancers when it was announced that the mystic midnight moment had arrived, and those who cared to do so were to go to the open windows and on to the doorsteps and the balconies to listen and wait for the solemn peal that was to mark the annual recommencement. Brierley got a wrap to throw over his cousin's shoulders, and then they went to the further corner of the long hallway.

"Are you thinking of the new year?" asked Cecil.

"No; I was thinking of Tantalus."

"I hope you pity him."

"I don't think I do," responded his cousin softly, feeling glad that the shadows hid her blushing cheek. "Perhaps his prize was not so far out of his reach as he imagined."

"Sibyl, didn't Densham ask you anything?" he whispered.

"Yes, Cecil, and—and I performed a modern miracle."

"My darling!" and then there was silence.

"Sibyl, you know I am not a rich man, and I am not a lord."

"And you are not horribly conceited and selfish either, dear."

He did not remove his arm; and a sudden hush of expectancy quieted the chattering party. Nothing was heard for a moment, and then from a dozen clanging clocks all around them there boomed forth the solemn chime that announced the birth of the new year.

The Secret of Health is Elimination of Waste

Every business man knows how difficult it is to keep the pigeon holes and drawers of his desk free from the accumulation of useless papers. Every housewife knows how difficult it is to keep her home free from the accumulation of all manner of useless things. So it is with the body. It is difficult to keep it free from the accumulation of waste matter. Unless the waste is promptly eliminated the machinery of the body soon becomes clogged. This is the beginning of most human ills.

ALCOHOL AND WAR

(By Sir James Crichton-Browne in the 'Observer,' London.)

When the history of the present great and terrible war comes to be written it will, I believe, be found that alcohol has made a nefarious, pernicious part, both directly and negatively, in its progress and final issue. It has been responsible, I believe, in some degree for the hideous cruelties and barbarities perpetrated in Belgium and France by the soldiers of Germany, cruelties and barbarities which have deprived her of the moral support of the civilized world.

On the other hand, the withdrawal of alcohol by Russia, by means of her decree prohibiting the sale of vodka, a terrible source of demoralization and disease, will be found to have strengthened her arm and helped her to those victories she is achieving and to that sustained resistance necessary to compass this ultimate war to a triumphant finish in Berlin.

We have moreover the scientific fact that possession of alcohol is attended by qualities without its drawbacks.

Long at tea, I sometimes think that alcohol should be spelt with an A instead of two Es, for tea has been one of the agents of mankind. I verily believe that but for the introduction of tea and coffee Europe might have drunk itself to death.

I received a great surgeon, Mr Jawson Fair, telling me I always operate at nine o'clock in the morning, and I find that if I take wine at dinner the previous evening, even only a pint of claret, my fingers are not just as exact and nimble as they are when I have had no wine at all, and so I never take wine or any stimulant when I have to operate.

Well, the meaning of all this is that in a very recently organized, and almost unique, institution, I met, when there last [illegible]

FARMER'S WIFE ALMOST A WRECK

Restored to Health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound—Her Own Story.

London, Ont.—"I am a farmer's wife and a very busy woman. Last summer I was taken with severe pains in my back so bad that I could not get up or scarcely move without pain, and my periods were painful. My husband called in a good doctor and I was under his care for some time, but he did me little or no good.

One day a friend of mine told me to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound as she had been greatly helped by it. I began taking it and soon got well, and my periods became natural again. Since then I have had perfect health. In fact I have never felt so well in my life. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is a medicine many women need. If you think this letter will help other women please publish it."—Mrs. K. C. Young, Tambling's Corner, London, Ontario, Canada.

Women who suffer from those distressing ills peculiar to their sex should not doubt the ability of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to restore their health.

If you have the slightest doubt that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound will help you, write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. (confidential) Lynn, Mass., for advice. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman, and held in strict confidence.

Hints for the Home

From a Nurse's Notebook.

Cream Toast.—Make thin slices of golden brown toast, crisp and dry. Place the slices in a wire sieve and steam until soft over hot water. Then butter and put in a soup plate—about three slices, cut in half. Over them pour white sauce. Make this by beating a cupful of milk in a double boiler and then adding two tablespoonfuls of flour rubbed into two tablespoonfuls of butter. Cook gently over a low heat until the flour has lost its starchy taste. Season with salt and pepper and serve very hot. Such a dish loses its appetizing qualities if it is not hot when served, so it should be carefully covered in transit from the kitchen to the room where it is to be served.

Eggnog.—Beat the yolk of an egg until it is creamy and add a pinch of salt. Then add enough milk to fill a glass three-quarters full. Last, add the white beaten stiff, and sprinkle with grated nutmeg. This is nourishing and, excepting in cases where raw egg cannot be digested, is easily assimilated.

Lamb Broth. Lamb broth can be taken by almost every one. Here is a good recipe for making it. Have a pound of the neck of lamb cut into small pieces and put it in a granite or aluminum saucepan with two cupfuls of cold water for two hours. Then bring it to the boiling point and let it cook, just below the boiling point, for three hours. Strain and season with salt. This could easily be made in a fireless cooker.

Chicken Broth. This can be made in the same way as lamb broth. Use the neck, the wings and the back of chicken and reserve the other parts for other uses. If rice can be taken, a little rice, well boiled, [illegible] lamb broth.

Clam Broth. Wash six clams and put them in a kettle with half a cup [illegible] water [illegible] until they [illegible] Clam broth and beef broth may both be frozen, just to the mush stage, and then served in a sherbet glass. A feverish patient often finds this broth sherbet tempting.

Cornmeal Gruel. All gruels must be thoroughly cooked, and very [illegible] free from lumps. Put three tablespoonfuls of cornmeal [illegible] third of a cupful of cold water [illegible] salt to taste, and then add two [illegible] of boiling water. Boil 20 minutes, stirring constantly, [illegible] in a double boiler for an hour.

Cracker Gruel. Break [illegible] soda [illegible] into a cupful of boiling milk and cook [illegible] three or four minutes. Season with salt.

Oatmeal Gruel. Cook half a cup [illegible] oatmeal in a quart [illegible] water. When the [illegible] strain and [illegible] with hot milk.

Stewed Prunes and Figs. Wash [illegible] to be stewed and then [illegible] water for ten hours. Cook for half an hour in the same water. Sweeten slightly if necessary.

Spinach on Toast.—Cook some well washed spinach for 20 minutes in boiling, salted water; drain it and rub it through a sieve. Have ready a piece of buttered, thin toast which has been quickly dipped in boiling water. Moisten the spinach with a little melted butter, season with salt and pepper, and pile lightly on toast.

Custard with Fruit. Very often good boiled custard can be served to advantage with fruit. The fruit adds attractiveness to the custard and to tempts the appetite. A few prunes, neatly cut in pieces, can be covered with custard; dates can be used in the same way; orange pulp cut in dice can be added to it, or a spoonful of apple snow can be placed on top of a dishful of custard.

Apple Snow. Bake an apple in an earthen dish covered. Remove core and skin before baking. Then rub it through a sieve, add it to the well beaten white of an egg and beat for 20 minutes. Sweeten to taste and serve piled up in a glass cup.

Orange Whip. Squeeze the juice from an orange. Beat the white of an egg and add a tablespoonful of sugar and a little of the orange juice, beating stiff again. Then pour the rest of the juice into a glass cup, pile on the white, and serve.

Grapefruit and Orange. Grapefruit pulp cut in dice and served in a glass with the juice of an orange and a very little sugar, with a tablespoonful of brandy or sherry, if that is allowed, makes a most refreshing dish for an invalid.

Bavarian Cream. Bavarian creams of all sorts make delicious and nourishing desserts for invalids. For chocolate Bavarian cream, soak half a box of gelatin in cold water for at least half an hour. In a double boiler heat one pint of milk and two ounces of grated chocolate; add the gelatin and stir until dissolved. Next add half a cup of sugar and remove from the stove. Turn into a deep bowl and add one teaspoonful of vanilla; set this bowl into a pan of ice water and stir until it thickens like a sauce; then add a pint of cream whipped stiff. Stir lightly, pour into a mould, wet with cold water, set it on ice and serve with whipped cream. This must be made very early in the morning if it is to be used for lunch or tea. If a fruit cream is desired substitute fruit juice, stewed and strained, or the juice from canned fruit, for the milk, omitting the grated chocolate. Both raspberry and peach Bavarian cream are delicious.

Useful Hints.

Two or three slices of lemon put in the boiling water will whiten linen.

Make whitewash with skim milk instead of water, it makes ceilings whiter, and stops them peeling.

A raw potato cut in half will clean marks off black material. A black serge garment can be made absolutely spotless and as new, if washed in potato water.

After you have used all the ham that will cut nicely from the bone, and after chipping the remaining meat for frizzled ham, boil the bone with cabbage.

To make shepherd's pie, cut boiled beef into slices, season and brown; add a gravy to the meat, cover with mashed potatoes or biscuit crust and brown in the oven.

Use a paper dishrag. It is far more sanitary than a cloth, is firm and cleans well. One lasts for about a month, can then be burned, and another purchased in its place.

When making mush, do not thicken it too much or the mush will be harsh and unpleasant to eat. Quit thickening before you think it thick enough and it will be about right.

Fats that are derived from the cooking of bacon, ham, chicken, beef and other meats, should be kept, each in its own receptacle, to be used for different purposes.

Mashed potatoes, left over, should be packed into a [illegible] until needed for frying. Another way to use them is to put into a double boiler with some cream [illegible].

To remove the odor of food from a wooden chopping bowl, soak the bowl in boiling water in which a little soda is dissolved. [illegible] water.

If a small piece of camphor is placed in a bowl or glass of water it will be found to float on the surface, and when lighted will prove a good night light, especially as camphor is a good disinfectant and its smell is not at all disagreeable.

NAVIES' CASUALTIES

Sea Fights More Destructive to Life Than Formerly.

That the immense armies of today make war more sanguinary than at any other authentically recorded era of the world's history is the consensus of military expert opinion. Whether the ratio of casualties to the number engaged is higher than in the period when the musket's range was 200 yards remains to be determined when this war is over and there is opportunity to study the official returns of the killed and wounded, but the loss of life may be safely put down as exceeding the world's past experience of war, tragic as that experience has been. Modern war, which requires armies of millions, may be expected to slay its tens of thousands where war as it was one hundred years ago was contented with its hundreds.

What is true of war on land applies to war at sea, although the hecatomb is not as conspicuous after a naval battle as after one fought on terra firma. The number of lives lost by the blowing up of the four British cruisers Aboukir, Cressy, Hogue and Hawke, 1,984, exceeds by almost three hundred the total casualties sustained by Nelson's fleet at Trafalgar. Assuming that the German flagship Scharnhorst was sunk with all on board in the recent battle off the Falklands, she carried down with her more than eight hundred officers and men, a number of victims almost equalling the killed and wounded of the victors of the battle of the Nile, respectively 218 and 678. To get the clearest idea of the contrast between present and old time naval warfare it must be remembered that Nelson commanded twenty-seven fighting ships at Trafalgar and fifteen at the Nile. The losses of the vanquished in these two battles cannot be stated with precision, but they would naturally be heavier than those of the victors, more especially as both the French and the Spaniards crowded their ships with men.

The modern battle fought with fleets and vessels three or more miles apart offers another opportunity for heavier losses in the difficulty attendant on rescuing the crew of a sinking ship. It was easy enough for the victors in old times to get rescuing boats into the water, but now even with steam launches it may easily be too late to succor men desperately battling with the waves at a distance not to be passed without the consumption of considerable time.

Had Heard of Them.

It was company field training. The captain saw a young soldier trying to cook his breakfast with a badly made fire. Going to him, he showed him how to make a quick cooking fire, saying:

"Look at the time you are wasting. When I was on the West coast I often had to hunt my breakfast. I used to go about two miles in the jungle, shoot my food, skin or pluck it, then cook and eat it, and return to the camp under the half-hour."

Then he unwisely added:

"Of course, you have heard of the West coast?"

"Yes, sir," replied the young soldier, "and also of Ananias and Baron Munchausen, too."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL STUDY

INTERNATIONAL LESSON, JANUARY 10.

Lesson II. Deborah and Barak Deliver Israel.—Judg. 4:4-23; 5:1-22. Golden Text. Psa. 34, 17.

Verse 4. The wife of Lappidoth.—Deborah was a married woman. She was a wife in the home, and, undoubtedly, the mother of children. This is a very early evidence that great leadership in the state is not inconsistent with wifely and motherly faithfulness and attention to the duties of the home. Much has been said about the particular sphere of women with the implication that this sphere is the home alone. No wife or mother has the right to neglect either her husband or her children, but woman's sphere is any place of service which will help the cause of humanity. This was Deborah's sphere.

5. Dwelt under the palm tree of Deborah between Ramah and Bethel in the hill-country of Ephraim.—Because of the incursions of the Canaanites, it was no longer safe for the Israelites to have their seat of government, as it were, or, rather, the place of judgment, in the northeastern part of their borders, and hence they went up into the hill-country of Ephraim. The judges sat in an open place, usually under the gate of the city or in the market-place, where many people could be gathered together for special announcements. "The earliest seats of Israel's worship, the earliest rallies to her patriotism, were upon Mount Ephraim" (George Adam Smith).

6. And she sent and called Barak.—Deborah saw very quickly what the greatest need of Israel was, and she also discovered that the time was ripe for a decisive blow. So she sent for the man on whom she thought victory would rest. Barak mobilized his troops on Mount Tabor. Kedesh in Galilee is the old, important and very often mentioned city of the Old Testament. Reference is made to it in the Tel el Amarna letters and in the Egyptian inscriptions. Other references in the Bible are Josh. 20:7; 21:32. The inhabitants in B.C. 734 were captured and taken away by Tiglath Pileser. Josephus says that the city lay between Galilee and the Tyrian border, and that it was in the hands of the Tyrians, who were continually fighting with the Israelites.

7. The river Kishon.—This river flowed at the foot of Mount Carmel. It was [illegible] called [illegible] Megiddo (Judg. 5:19). The Kishon was a swift flowing, turbulent stream.

8. Barak said, If thou wilt go with me, then I will go, but if thou wilt not go with me, I will not go.—It is strange that a warrior, used to battle, should be afraid to go into the conflict without the presence of a woman who presumably knew nothing about warfare.

9. And she said, I will surely go with thee.—Doubtless there was considerable argument between Deborah and Barak before she finally agreed to go. She could not see why Barak ought not to lead his army to victory.

Notwithstanding, the journey that thou takest shall not be for thine honor; for Jehovah will sell Sisera into the hand of a woman.—Deborah calls attention to the fact that Barak was less great than he might have been, and that, although he would win the victory, it would not be his victory; it would be the victory of Deborah who was his inspiration, his real leader.

10. And Barak called Zebulun and Naphtali together to Kedesh.—These tribes were very quickly rallied, for we read that there went up ten thousand men at his feet. "At his feet" is a very picturesque expression to indicate the eagerness of the Israelites to follow the call of Deborah and Barak. They came in such numbers and were so ready for the fray that they virtually crowded round his feet.

11. Now Heber the Kenite had separated himself from the Kenites.—This verse seems to be introduced to show how it was that Sisera (see verse 17) could flee away to the tent of Heber the Kenite for refuge.

12. And they told Sisera.—The news of the movements among the Israelites was brought to Sisera in his headquarters by his scouts.

13. Sisera gathered together all his chariots, even nine hundred chariots of iron.—These were the awful implements used by the heathen people against the Israelites. They were instruments of torture. As the fighting between the Israelites and their enemies was hand-to-hand conflict, it is readily seen how terrible these iron chariots, which were arranged with teeth and other sharp protuberances, appeared to the Israelites.

From Harosheth of the Gentiles, unto the river Kishon.—This was the far flung battle line which Sisera threw out, reaching from Mount Tabor over to Mount Carmel, although it is evident that his forces were massed at the River Kishon.

14. And Deborah said unto Barak, Up.—Deborah was close at the side of Barak, as Barak evidently was depending entirely upon her. He moves when she commands. His command, however, brings the ten thousand Israelites after him.

15. And Jehovah discomfited Sisera.—The Israelites were fighting for Jehovah, they were fighting immediately under his leadership. When a battle went in favor of the Israelites, it was because they believed Jehovah discomfited the enemy. This further evidences how close the tie was between the Israelites and their God, and how, after all, the entire credit was given to him.

With the edge of the sword.—As already stated, the fighting of the Israelites with their enemies was hand-to-hand conflict. It must have been fierce in its contact.

Sisera alighted from his chariot, and fled away on his feet.—Sisera evidently was a coward. He left his men to their own discomfiture. He himself would flee to safety. This fact relieves somewhat the awfulness of the manner in which he met his death shortly afterwards at the hands of a woman (Judg. 4:17, 22).

16. But Barak pursued after the chariots, and after the hosts.—Even the chariots were put to confusion, so that the footmen of the Israelites could pursue the horses of the enemy. "Not a man left," is the emphatic way in which the writer describes the awful loss that the enemy suffered.

GRAND DUKE NICHOLAS.

Victorious Leader of Army Is Virtually Dictator of Russia.

A Jupiter or a Mars in appearance, six feet six inches in his stockings, lean and lithe as a race horse, towering above his fellows with the easy grace of a prince, but alert, suspicious, self-reliant; the head long and narrow with delicate lines of ancestry, refinement, and the extreme idealism which is bigotry, covered now with the sparse grey locks of 58, remnants of golden curls of childhood; the chin bold and assertive, and the mouth sensuous, cold and cruel, both softened to the casual judgment by the cloak [illegible] the blue eyes patient, calculating, alive with intelligence and quick with command, and yet the eager eyes of the adventurer [illegible] many struggles [illegible] and power [illegible] Grand Duke Nicholas [illegible] Russia [illegible] throughout the [illegible] of all the Russias.

Grand Duke Nicholas.

[illegible] pising his Russian father, who had broken the mother's heart by infidelities, who had dishonored the family name and dissipated the family fortune, Nicholas, as soon as he was grown, gravitated with unerring instinct and unresisting will into the path his father had trod, remembering only that the father had been a famous soldier.

Handicapped by His Strength.

Nicholas was from the beginning of his military career handicapped in various ways. Alexander III. did not enjoy the contrast between his three puny, narrow-chested, dull-eyed sons and this youthful Jove, his cousin, before whom statesmen and peasants bowed with unconscious homage, whispering beneath their breath, "If only he could be our future Czar." Every impediment to advancement was placed in the young man's way. The Imperial pleasure limited him to cavalry. It did not make Alexander III.'s crown feel easier upon his head when he realized that his cavalry was said to be the best in Europe, and that Nicholas Nicholaievitch had made it so.

The St. Petersburg Court teemed with scandals against the men whom his kinsman, the Czar, desired not to honor. Nicholas was too poor to combat them with his own paid agents, his father having bequeathed him scarcely anything but debts. The confiding, middle-aged widow of a merchant millionaire became his morganatic wife. She remained in Moscow, contented to parade her royal connection among her bourgeois friends, far removed in distance and knowledge from the affairs at Court. Nicholas was outwardly faithful to her until she died and her fortune was his own. Almost the next day his marriage arrangements were announced to the woman he had secretly longed for years to make his wife, the Princess Anastasia of Montenegro.

A Slavic Wife.

Alexander III. had brought three of the daughters of the King of Montenegro from their father's mountain home to be educated in his household. They were hostages for Montenegro's political submission. The youngest, Princess Helen is Queen of Italy to-day. Her two sisters, Alexander III. settled in accordance with his wishes. Princess Militza became the wife of the Grand Duke Peter, brother of Nicholas Nicholaievitch. Princess Anastasia was married to the Duke of Leuchtenberg. It was when she was the wife of another man that Nicholas Nicholaievitch wooed and won his present wife. Patiently they waited until she could persuade the Czar Nicholas to permit the divorce and until he was himself free to marry.

Anastasia was forty when she became the Grand Duchess Nicholas. She has the vigorous frame, the far-sighted intelligence, and the emotional devotion to the cause of the Slavs which characterize her old father. She was endowed with the barbaric voluptuous beauty of the Orient, and at the Court of St. Petersburg she early learned the arts of fascination and political intrigue practised there with Oriental finesse. She is a firebrand in spreading the gospel of the brotherhood of the Slavs and unscrupulous in the methods employed to further her husband's ambitions as the natural leader of the Russian Slavs.

The Grand Duchess Nicholas has long since become a Russian of the Russians. Regal in bearing, magnificently gowned in the costume of the ancient Czarina, she has more than once created a furore at the fancy dress ball.

Anastasia has however thwarted her husband [illegible] at a vital point. Married for seven years, she has not presented him with a child.

Seized Reins of Power.

When the [illegible] war [illegible] Grand Duke Nicholas assumed the supreme command [illegible] by force [illegible] He issued manifestoes [illegible] Poles without consulting the Czar, this one known [illegible] The Cabinet [illegible] of the Empire [illegible] meetings at Petrograd, save when the Czar is at headquarters in the West, and its are [illegible] submitted to the Autocrat for [illegible] But the real executive [illegible] Grand Duke Nicholas, since every member of the Cabinet belongs to the Court Military party acknowledging the Grand Duke as its leader. The Czar does not dare defy his Cabinet during a state of war, and the Cabinet obediently obeys the commander in chief.

People Are Ignorant.

The people know almost nothing concerning the progress of events. The socialistic Russian papers and those printed in the German tongue have long ago been suppressed. A double censorship is in force for the papers still in existence, all reports of the war and political comment going twice to the censor, first in manuscript and then in printed form.

The Russian people who are loyal to the Czar are disturbed and restless over the problem of [illegible] The little Czarevitch, Grand Duke Alexander, ten years old last July, is hopelessly lame and fragile; a sturdy, perfectly formed baby, growing up to robust health [illegible] in health by the negligent of [illegible] heard his father's uncle two years ago, due to the [illegible] of the revolutionists. [illegible] kill him had failed. [illegible] cripple and torture by lingering disease has succeeded. No one believes he will live to manhood. The Czarina is forty-two and is not likely to give a second heir to the Imperial Crown.

The Czar's brother, Michael Alexandrovitch, the heir to the throne until the Czar's son was born, has steadfastly refused to give the Government any hope that he would ever accept the crown. He is now in the field fighting for Russia, but has left his morganatic wife and young family back in England, where he will undoubtedly return whenever peace comes again.

The next in succession are the sons of the Grand Duke Vladimir, the brother of Alexander III.—Grand Duke Cyril, who is married to his cousin, daughter of the English Duke of Edinburgh, and Grand Duchess Marie, Alexander II.'s only daughter; Grand Duke Boris, and Grand Duke Andrew. Cyril alone of the three brothers is married, and he has no son, only two infant daughters.

Will He Become Czar?

After them the succession in the regular order falls to the Grand Duke Serge, another brother of Alexander III., who by his royal marriage with a sister of the King of Greece, Serge has a son, Grand Duke Dimitri, twenty-three years old, handsome, elegant, and irresponsible. With him ends the hopes of an heir through the descendants of Alexander II.

It would surprise few people at court if the betrothal was announced of the Grand Duke Dimitri and the Grand Duchess Olga, the eldest daughter of the Czar, with the proclamation that Olga was to ascend the throne as sovereign Czarina in the event of the death of her crippled brother, Dimitri being Czar consort.

Grand Duke Nicholas can well disregard these elaborate precautions to secure the succession in the regular line as mere stumbling blocks which he can thrust aside in his strong, masterful stride to seat himself upon the throne. The Russian people may so wish to reward him if he is victorious in the war against Germany. At any rate he will be a great popular hero, completely overshadowing the Czar.

A STRIKING NARRATIVE.

Theodore Hook's Contribution to Strike Literature.

A strike all too often becomes a serious affair, a general strike, which involves allied or sympathetic trades along with those more directly connected, is even more threatening or disastrous. In France, especially, the general strike is dreaded, and long ago, as newspaper readers will recall, [illegible]

He came home and found his young wife dissolved in tears. "What do you think has happened?" she cried. "I left the cage open and our canary has flown away."

He undertook to give what consolation he might, and took the poor, distressed woman in his arms. As she rested against his shoulder a new access of sobs convulsed her. "Ah, George," she murmured, in a choking voice, "now I've only you left."

THE ROYAL BANK

ISSUES ITS STRONGEST STATEMENT.

Cash on hand reaches record level of 17.93% and liquid assets total 40.18% of liabilities to public. Bank writes off half a million an value of investments. Surprising results under exceptional trade conditions.

The great care which has been exercised this year by the larger banks of Canada in maintaining themselves in the strongest possible position, and in this way being able to guard against any developments that might arise in the country, is strikingly illustrated by the showing made by the Royal Bank of Canada in its annual statement for the fiscal year ending Nov. 30th, 1914.

A close study of the general statement of assets and liabilities would seem to indicate that the management has given its every consideration towards keeping the bank strong both in cash and immediate liquid assets, such a policy being rendered advisable by the very unusual conditions brought about in Canada by the outbreak of the European war. In order to maintain such a position, even opportunities for profits were apparently ignored to some extent, but as a result the statement, as a whole, is perhaps the strongest ever issued by the Royal Bank and at the present time this should be as satisfactory to shareholders as it is reassuring to the public generally. Under the conditions it enables the bank to play a prominent part in helping the Dominion through an unprecedented situation.

New Record of Cash on Hand.

The part of the general statement which is of particular interest, in perhaps that which shows the cash position and the liquid assets. At the end of the fiscal year, the amount of cash on hand reached the new high level of $27,462,866, which is equivalent to such an ample percentage as 17.93% of liabilities to the public. This account compares with $21,466,209, last year, which was equivalent to 13.34%, or an increase of over $5,000,000. Including the cash on hand, the liquid assets amount to $71,244,677, which is equivalent to as much as 40.18% of liabilities to public. The principal accounts in this department include notes of other banks, $2,625,305; cheques on other banks, $5,752,485; balance due by banks and banking correspondents elsewhere than in Canada, $3,144,502; Dominion and Provincial Government securities not exceeding market value, $1,158,568; Canadian Municipal securities and British, foreign and colonial public securities, other than Canadian, $2,186,062; railway and other bonds, debentures and stocks, not exceeding market value, $13,557,741; call loans in Canada, $8,574,058; call and short loans elsewhere than in Canada, $6,080,847.

Indication of Contraction in Trade.

With the falling off in general business in the country, the current loans have naturally shown a contraction, these amounting to $84,585,972, as compared with $96,959,230 at the end of the previous year and other current loans and discounts elsewhere than in Canada, $15,002,488, as compared with $15,551,394.

Growth During Year.

Even under the unprecedented conditions that prevailed, the progress of the bank, as indicated by increased deposits, was most satisfactory. Deposits not bearing interest at the end of the year totalled $33,224,129, as compared with $36,276,871, at the end of the previous year, while deposits bearing interest reached a new high level at $104,457,073, as compared with $101,900,790. The total deposits aggregated $138,051,208, as against $138,177,622, a decrease of approximately $2,000,000. It will be remembered, however, that during the year the Bank repaid the deposit of the Alberta and Great Waterways Co., amounting to $7,000,000, and allowing for this, the ordinary deposits during the year showed an increase of $5,000,000.

Large Amounts Written Off.

The profit and loss account indicates that owing to the exceptional conditions, the management has deemed it advisable to follow a very conservative policy in its valuation of investments, and this year has made a special reservation on this account of $500,000.

The profits for the year amounted to $1,886,142, equivalent to 16.30% on the paid up capital. As the balance of profit and loss at the end of the previous year amounted to $1,015,179, the total amount available for distribution, with the profits added, amounted to $2,901,262. Of this amount dividends accounted for $1,387,200; $100,000 was transferred to officers' pension fund; $250,000, written off bank premises' account; $50,000, contributed to patriotic funds; $500,000, allowed for depreciation in investments. This left balance to be carried forward to profit and loss account at the end of the year, $614,062.

H. S. HOLT, EDSON L. PEASE.
President. Gen. Man

Montreal, 18th December, 1914.

The annual meeting of the shareholders will be held in Montreal, on Thursday, January 14 next, and the resume of the president, H. S. Holt, is looked forward to with considerable interest in financial and business circles.

The Pathos of Life.

One of the reflections most common to people of more than average thoughtfulness is something like this: "When we go hence how little accompaniment we leave behind us, and how well the world goes on without us." It is as pathetic as it is true of most of us. We do not distinguish deeds. We do not realize our ideals. When the most faithful worker dies a crowd is ready to rush into the place left vacant even if it be inconspicuous. Few leave a memory that endures for a generation except in the hearts of a handful of friends. If this life is to be regarded as final we might be tempted to regard it as not worth living, it is so disappointing to our noblest hopes, our loftiest ideals. But if this life is a discipline, a preparatory school, if the chief gain of any life is not fame but character, even our disappointments and frustrations are prophetic. Life is a cruel mystery unless its horizon be widened to include eternity.

Savages Insignificant Size.

Is it not possible that we who have never ventured far from our home may under-estimate the intelligence and brain capacity of those great tribes of savages who are but a name to us. A scientist, lecturing recently in London, stated that he was one of a party of scientists who journeyed to Torres Straits, and in carrying out investigations discovered that the head measurement, or cranial capacity, of the natives was just about the same as that of the average University undergraduate. In the interior of Borneo the scientists unearthed a savage tribe who live in houses a hundred yards long, raised on twenty-feet poles, with chambers for each family, and a long corridor for the communal life of the joint tenants. The nature of these latter dwellings indisputably shows that the natives have a keen sense of the hygienic, and their social intercourse exhibits the true spirit of brotherhood.

Do Long Breaths Hurt?

DANGEROUS PLEURISY ALWAYS BEGINS THIS WAY.

Speediest Cure is Nerviline.

Ouch, that stabbing pain in the side is like a thin knife blade in the ribs! Probably got over-heated—cooled too fast—now there is congestion, tightness, such soreness you can't draw a long breath.

Quickest relief will come from a vigorous rubbing with Nerviline. This trusty old pain reliever wills you up in no time—will take away the congestion—make you well just as it did Mr. Samuel St. Johns, of Stamford, who says:—"In running to catch a train last week I became much overheated. I put up the train window and rode that way in order to get cooled off. In an hour my side was so full of pain and my breathing hurt so much that I thought I had pneumonia. I always carry Nerviline in my grip and at destination I rubbed my side thoroughly three times. The warm penetrating effect was soon noticeable and I quickly got relief. Nerviline I consider saved me from a serious illness."

Any sort of a cold can be quickly broken up with Nerviline whic, is a marvel for reducing inflammation, for relieving congestion in the throat and chest, for curing stitch in the side, lumbago, neuralgia, sciatica or rheumatism. Nothing more soothing or powerful. The 50c. large family size is the most economical. Small trial size 25c. at dealers everywhere.

And the less some people give the more they expect.

When a Woman Suffers With Chronic Backache

There is Trouble Ahead.

Constantly on their feet, attending to the wants of a large and exacting family, women often break down with nervous exhaustion

In the stores, factories, and on a farm are weak, ailing women, dragged down with torturing backache and bearing down pains.

The dizziness, insomnia, deranged menses and other symptoms of kidney complaint can't cure themselves, they require the assistance of Dr. Hamilton's Pills which go direct to the seat of the trouble.

To give vitality and power to the kidneys, to tone up the bladder and liver, to free the blood of poisons, probably there is no remedy so successful as Dr. Hamilton's Pills. For all women's irregularities their merit is well known.

Because of their mild, soothing, and healing effect, Dr. Hamilton's Pills are safe, and are recommended for girls and women of all ages. 25 cents per box at all dealers. Refuse any substitute for Dr. Hamilton's Pills of Mandrake and Butternut.

THE KAISER'S LATEST ULTIMATUM.

Gott, Gott, dear Gott, attention please:
Yes,
Your hardner kaiser's here..
Und has a word or two to say
Into your private ear;
So durn away all udders now
Und listen vell to me.
For vat I say concerns me much,
Meinself und Shermany.'

You know, dear Gott, I vas your friendt,
Und from mein hour of birth
I quietly let you rule in Heffen,
Vile I ruled here on earth.
Und yen I told mein soldiers
Of byegone battle days,
I gladly split de glory,
Und half gave you of praise.

In every way I tried to prove
Mein heart to you vas true,
Und only claimed mein honest share
In great deeds dat ve do.
You could not haf a better friendt
In sky, or land or sea,
Dan Kaiser Vilhelm number two,
De lord of Shermany.

So vat I say, dear Gott, is dis,
Dat ve should still be friendis,
Und you should help to send my foes
To meet deir bitter ends
If you, dear Gott, will dis me do
I'll nothing ask again.
Und, you and I will hardners be
For evermore, Amen!

But listen, Gott, it must be mighty quick
Your help to me you send,
Or else I haf to stop attack
And only blay defend.
So four and twenty hours I gif
To make de Allies run
Und put me safe into mein blace—
De middle of de Sun

If you do dis, I'll do my hart:
I'll tell de world dot fact,
But if you don't, den I must tink
It is an hostile act.
Den var at once I will declare,
Und in mein anger rise
Und send mein Zepp'lin ships to wage
A fight up in de skies.

Dis ultimatum now, dear Gott,
Is von of many more,
Mine mind is settled up to clean
De whole vorld off de floor.
Because you vas mein bardner, Gott,
An extra chance is giffen;
So help at vonce, or else I'll be De Emperor of Heffen.

TRAPS FOR OFFICERS.

Some Tempting Bribes That Have Been Refused.

Immense public interest is always aroused when the names of British officers are associated with bribery. Hundreds of attempts are made to induce men who hold high rank to betray their country; and before Secret Service was brought to such a fine art as it is to-day, attempts were still more numerous.

While he was governor of Gibraltar the late Sir Henry Smith one day received a mysterious letter offering £1,000 in return for "a slight service," which the letter did not describe.

Sir Henry took no notice of the communication. But in a few days came another letter increasing the offer to £2,000, and covertly suggesting that the governor might turn a blind eye on the landing of men and weapons behind the Rock.

Next, a notable sheik, Wazir Mahomet Ali, called and offered £3,000, finally £5,000, for the favor mentioned.

Rising abruptly from his seat the governor, a big, powerful man, took the sheik by the shoulders, twisted him round, ran him to the door, and sent him sprawling down a flight of steps.

Some years ago a Captain Grant was despatched on a diplomatic mission to a little state beyond the north-west frontier of India. First there was an attempt upon his life, but Grant managed to convey the idea to the native ruler, who knew no law except fear, that there was an extensive British force in the background.

Afterwards he was visited by a distinguished envoy of the ruler, who offered the equivalent of £500 if Grant would settle the matter in hand in accordance with the ruler's wishes. Gradually the offer increased to £1,500 in money, the best horse in the district, and five wives to be selected by the young officer himself. Grant did not accept the offer.

Sir Robert Hart, the famous administrator, when in China, one morning woke to find a procession of bearers and carts before his dwelling with money, silks, vases, cedar chairs, and valuables to the tune of about £1,000, in English money. All this finery had been dumped down without any preliminary negotiations by the orders of a mandarin, who wanted some little shortcomings in the shape of embezzled Customs dues overlooked. Sir Robert, more amused than angry, bundled the whole lot back.

Different treatment was meted out, however, by an A.B. in the navy named Walter Barratt, who made the acquaintance of a charming and genial stranger at Plymouth. They had confidential chats, and the stranger threw out hints which the straightforward mind of the sailor failed to understand. Finally, feeling sure of his man, the tempter offered Barratt a bribe of £500 for the theft of a signal-code book.

When the bluejacket grasped the situation, he set about the man and pummelled him unmercifully. Barratt was "run in" for assault, but the charge was dismissed immediately when the magistrate heard the story.

HOW SHOT IS MADE.

Molten Lead Is Dropped From a High Point into a Water Tank.

The manufacture of shot, described by Mr. O. C. Horn, in Forest and Stream, requires a high tower, a perforated pan, a tank of water, and "tempered" lead.

Shot is made by dropping molten lead from a high point to the earth. The lead forms into globules just as the raindrops do when they fall from the clouds. Ordinarily, we do not realize that raindrops are little spheres, but under the proper conditions they freeze, and we have hailstones, which may be called shot made of ice.

In the making of shot, pure lead is melted and mixed with a "temper" that consists mainly of tin, and then poured into a perforated pan or piece. The perforations vary according to the size of shot to be made.

A temper is mixed with the lead in order to make the globules form when the lead falls. If pure lead were used, it would fall in the form of little bars, instead of round shot.

In order that the globules may have plenty of time to form, the lead must fall a long distance, and so towers are built. The towers used to be made as high as two hundred feet and even more, but modern towers are rarely over one hundred and fifty feet.

The perforated pan into which the molten lead is poured is at the top of the tower, and the globules of lead fall through the perforations into tanks of water at the bottom of the tower. The water cools them, and also prevents them from flattening out, as they would if they fell on a solid floor.

From the water the shot go to steam dryers. After drying the perfect shot are separated from the imperfect by means of glass tables inclined enough so that the shot, when poured on at one end of the table, will roll to the other end. At the farther end of the table are two gutters, side by side. The imperfect shot roll slowly and with difficulty, so that they have not enough momentum to carry them beyond the first gutter. The perfectly round shot roll easily and swiftly, and when they reach the foot of the table, they jump nimbly across the first gutter and land in the second.

After separation, the perfect shot are polished by rolling in plumbago, and women then put them in bags for shipment, or send them direct to the cartridge-filling department to be loaded into shells.

Any man can borrow trouble without bank references or security.

Some people are willing to take almost any old thing except a hint.

Sometimes a self-made man makes a noise like a phonograph.

Seeing Under Water.

It is undoubtedly true that, under certain conditions, it is possible from a good altitude to perceive objects at a certain depth below the surface but this is mainly the case with calm, clear water, with a favorable light. In the choppy gray waters which abound round British coasts, a submarine would rarely be detected; more especially as the view from the pilot's and observer's seats is, in the majority of cases, most defective at the present time, and the fierce slip-stream from the propeller revolving in front, added to the high speed of travel, render the use of goggles imperative. But, in the opinion of a writer in the London Daily Telegraph, minor difficulties such as these may, and no doubt will, be overcome in time, and experience alone can show in how far the aeroplane will serve as a protection against submarines.

What I Know.

I know that this day will never come again. Therefore I will make it the best day in which I have ever lived; I know that happiness is a thing within, and it is always in the world and very near to me; I know I have but to search for it, and that as soon as I begin to find it out I have it. Also, I know that as soon as I get happiness and begin to give it away it comes back doubled and more—to me. I know this. I know that work is a thing to love, and that it keeps the world alive and moving. I know that the people who work with love in their hearts and interest in their brains are the real doers and benefactors of mankind. I know that I can be a doer and a benefactor. I know that life is exactly what I make it. I know that other people and other forces may influence my life and work only as I follow it. I know that I am young if I live youth; I know that I am happy if I live happiness; I know that I am worth while if I attempt and accomplish worth-while things. I know that the greatest thing I can ever do is to do my best at all times and under every circumstance.—George Matthew Adams.

The "Honeymoon."

A custom commonly observed by newly-married couples among the ancient Teutons was drinking a wine made from honey during the first thirty days after marriage. The use of the word "moon" was used simply to designate the period of time, one month, that the use of the wine continued. In no other respect was the moon supposed to have significance in the matter. Although the custom of drinking this particular kind of wine was long ago abandoned, the word honeymoon has survived in a different sense. It is now applied to the period after marriage, long or short, generally devoted to a trip away from home.

For the first time in the history of S. S. No. 1 the annual meeting was attended by those of the second generation. There was not present a man of those who fought and toiled in pioneer days that their progeny might have educational advantages which they themselves were denied. The boys who played ball and shinny on the old school grounds now find themselves in the hey dey of life and have to assume the responsibilities handed down from the fathers whose life history is almost closed. UNDERWOOD

The annual nomination meeting held in the Tp Hall was attended by a large number of the ratepayers of the township. The nominations for the different offices were all well filled. Mr Mewhinney, the retiring reeve, gave a good account of his stewardship in both his county and township duties. Mr Mewhinney dealt almost exclusively with county matters, leaving the bulk of the township matters to the deputy-reeve and councillors. He said he was always under the impression that the northern townships were using the ones farther south as a good thing in the way of grants and bonuses. But when he became warden and saw the real truth of the whole thing he did not blame them for asking for grants as the northern proprietors having to pay as high as 20 mills on the dollar, their school rates were also higher and the payments small. The rate for Bruce township being 4 mills on the dollar. He also spoke for some length on the high class of work done by contractor McKinnon in the cement line, and of the generosity of Bruce county towards the ill fated Belgians and the red cross society. He also wished to impress upon the minds of the incoming council that the generosity of the township would be tested to the limit stating that we need in our council men who are patriotic and public spirited. In conclusion Mr Mewhinney said although he was quitting the township business his interest in the township matters would be none the less active. Mr Jas Johnston Deputy Reeve was then called. Mr Johnston after his opening remarks outlined the salaries of the county court officials also gave an account of the way in which the inmates of the House of Refuge were looked after, also the cost of each inmate per week to the county which the said amounted to $1.64. He did not approve of the county council being taken away from Walkerton as is usually the case for the June session for the reason that wherever they went no matter what grant was asked for by the town where they met it was always complied with. This has been going on for twenty-seven years and he thinks it is time to call a halt.. He also favored the equipping of one hospital properly instead of having two and neither of them anywhere near the standard, intimating that the Walkerton hospital should get the support of the people of the county of Bruce. The rural mail came in for considerable discussion, and Mr Johnston had quite a time to extricate himself from the many questions that some of the ratepayers hurled at him. Mr McKay the township clerk at last gave a fair explanation of the the whole matter which cleared Mr Johnston in the minds of the ratepayers. I concluded his speech with an appeal the people to give him their support as reeve for the coming year. Mr Hobson, councillor, was then called and made a neat speech pertaining to township matters and asking for the support of the ratepayers for office of deputy reeve. Mr Baker also spoke and and gave an outline of his year's duties as as councillor and asking to be returned to the same office for 1915 Mr Jas McKenzie also spoke for a short time and asking to be reinstated as councillor. The new nominees were then called and all responded to their calls in short speeches with the exception of Messrs McNeil and Kilpen who were not present.

LOYAT

About 200 friends and neighbors gathered at the home of Mr and Mrs John McKay on Monday evening, Dec. 28th and spent a very pleasant time with them before their departure for Paisley. The object of the gathering shows appreciation to the McKay family. The meeting was called to order by Mr Geo Brown who was appointed chairman. A very nice programme was rendered. Speeches were given by Messrs Brown, R Teeple, Councillor Geo Baker of Bruce and R Acton. Sungs were rendered by Messrs James Begg and L McLean Young, after which the following address was read by Mr Brown. Mr J W Ross and John Metcalf made the presentation.

To Mr and Mrs John McKay and Daughters:

DEAR FRIENDS—It is with much regret that we, your friends and neighbors, learn of your departure for your new home in Paisley. That we will miss you we can assure you, but what is our loss is others' gain. We have always found you all ready and willing when called upon for help, also to share our sorrows and our joys and give us a warm welcome when we visited your home. We have gathered here to spend an evening with you in your home, also to give you a slight token of our esteem and appreciation of the many kindnesses received from you all during the many years you have spent amongst us. We ask you to accept this kitchen cabinet, and may you all enjoy God's richest blessings, is the wish of your friends and neighbors. Signed by W J Ross, Bert Mawhinney, John Metcalf.

Mr McKay made a very appropriate reply on behalf of himself and family. Lunch was then served by the ladies after which a very pleasant time was spent in dancing and other games.

—It's only a dollar, but it means a good deal to THE ADVOCATE if hundreds are slow in paying that on their subscription.

—The Cargill junior hockey team gave the Paisley juniors quite a run for honors in the rink here on Monday night. The final score was 5-1. Both these teams have several players on their line-up who are real "comers" and with a little more weight and experience ought to make good players in a year or so.

—For offering butter for sale in unprinted wrappers the merchants of an Ontario town paid over $400 in fines one day recently. Butter wrappers must be printed to show whether dairy or creamery butter is contained therein. The principal people have been defrauding the public by working over dairy butter and labelling it creamery, because the latter sells at a few cents higher per pound generally. This is why the government has made a regulation providing that all wrappers must be plainly printed.

—Wierton Echo: John, Daniel and Wm. Ashcroft are to receive about three million dollars each from the estate of a grand uncle. It appears that this grand uncle, an eccentric old gentleman, owned about forty acres of land in New York City. The city wanted the land, but the old man would not sell, but he entered into a contract to rent it to the city for 99 years. This period has now expired and the city having grown, the land has vastly increased in value, being now estimated at forty million dollars, or one million dollars per acre. There are a number of heirs, but it figures out to about three million dollars each.

—Mr E Dawson in speaking of farm production points out that farmers will make a great mistake if they do not grow their own seed for mangels, turnips, carrots, etc. These seeds, heretofore, have come from France and Germany. This supply has been cut off and will not be available for some time to come even after the war is over. Mr Dawson says this is the year of opportunity for the tiller of the soil. Every farmer should become conversant with the shortage of production throughout the world and put forth an effort to supplement needed cereals which will bring good returns. Now is the time to select good specimen from their roots and plant them in the spring. These will produce the seed necessary for the next season's crop. It will be of the choicest kind because it is acclimatized—Kincardine Reporter. Mr Dawson has been growing potatoes for seed extensively and is therefore more in touch with the seed market conditions than the average farmer. His advice might be worth following by the farmers of this section.

—Have you paid your subscription yet?

—Mrs Longfield and children, of Toronto are visitors at the home of her parents, Mr and Mrs D. Munn, Goldie St.

—Mr. and Mrs. J. Shier, of Port Elgin, were visitors at the home of his cousin, Mrs. R. Petrie, for a couple of days last week.

—Knox church annual meeting will be held on Thursday, Jan 21st. The date is changed from 22nd owing to Farmers' Institute meeting.

—Mr and Mrs Wm Walker, of Paisley, announce the engagement of their daughter, Miss Ida L., to Mr Edward A Roberts, of Cartwright, Sask.

—The W.C.T.U. will meet in Putnam's hall on Friday afternoon, Jan. 15th, at 3 o'clock. All interested in this good work are requested to be present.

—Messrs. Seville and Werner of the Simcoe Poultry Co. here, were in Guelph attending the convention of the Canadian Produce Dealers' Association.

—Orders have been issued for the enlistment of the third Canadian contingent for overseas service. One hundred and fifty men are asked for from Bruce County. The training camp for these will be either at Guelph or Stratford.

—The ladies of the Patriotic League will pick a bale of clothing for the Belgians in Putnam's hall the first week in February, date to be announced later. Any ladies having clothing for men, women or children in good condition will please have them ready and watch for date.

—Everything in piece goods will be sold at half price. PUTNAM & SON.

—Many stock taking lines and ends at bargain prices. You may need some. Ballachey, Laidlaw & Co.

—JUST TO HAND—Car extra clear XXX B.C. red cedar shingles which we can sell at a low price for cash. Call and see us or give one and save money. J. S. DEWAR, Paisley.

—Auction sale of farm, farm stock and implements on lot 15, con. 7, Elderslie, (Gillies Hill,) on Thursday, Jan. 21st. The estate of the late Robt. Tully. R. C. Pearce, auct.

—FOUND—In Paisley, a fur necklace, a lady's neck fur. The owner can have same upon proving property and paying for this advertisement. J. R. Brown, Eden Grove.

—A box social in aid of the Belgian Relief Fund will be held in S.S. No. 7 & 8, Saug. & Elder. on Friday evening, Jan. 22nd. Good programme. Admission 15c, lady's with boxes free.

—Live Poultry Wanted. We are in the market for all kinds of live poultry, paying the highest cash prices. Delivery at our residence on Queen St north every week day. Simcoe Poultry Co.

—Having bought heavily for spring, as we expect a big advance will be made in almost all lines of merchandise, we will clear out all goods that are now on our shelves at half their regular price. PUTNAM & SON.

—Five Roses, Rainbow Pastry, Cream of the West, and Stark's high-grade flours, also Bran and Shorts. Blatchford's Sugar and Flax, Caldwell's Molasses Meal, and full line of Poultry Foods and Tonics. Always in the market for coarse grains. E. G. ECKEL.

—The Presbyterian church at Salem will hold a tea meeting on Thursday evening, Jan 14th. A good program of dialogues, recitations, songs, solos, instrumental music and addresses. Tea served from 6 to 8. Admission—25c and 15c. Sleighs will leave Paisley in time for supper.

—Admiring shoppers must not let their enthusiasm get away with their judgment. Inducements to buy ready-made clothing will be great. Don't be carried away. Have a Suit or Overcoat made to order, and you know that it is made to fit your figure, not that of some manufacturer's model. Ladies' work given special attention. G. B. IRWIN.

—BUTTER PAPER—real vegetable parchment, not a cheaper imitation—printed and sold at The Advocate Office at lowest possible prices. We can print 500 sheets or more with your name on, and for the convenience of those who do not require that quantity, we keep printed wrappers on hand without any name on and sell this in quantities of 100 sheets or over.

—We are now established in our new quarters and are prepared to supply all your wants in Groceries, Bread, Chinaware, etc. Just now we are showing a nice line of fish, including fresh frozen B. C. salmon and halibut, also finnan haddie, which makes an agreeable change from meat and are quite economical. Come and see us or phone your orders. Prompt delivery to any part of the town. W. S. MITCHELL, Hyde's old stand.

—Farmers' Institute meetings will be held in the town hall, Paisley, on Jan. 22nd, at 2 and 8 o'clock p.m. As Paisley and Ripley are the only places in the riding at which meetings will be held this winter, every farmer living in this part of the riding should make an effort to attend the Paisley meetings. The delegates are Messrs. R. Murphy of Allanton, and F. M. Johnston of Bentoe, both good practical men who will endeavor to give some suggestions as to the best way of increasing the production of foodstuff which will be so much needed for some time to come. In the afternoon the Women's Institute will be addressed by Miss Susie Campbell of Brampton. A joint meeting will be held in the evening, when music will be furnished by the orchestra. A cordial invitation extended to all.

—Mr. G. B. Irwin has abandoned the ranks of the benedicts, the important step being taken while he was in Toronto a few days ago, when he led to the altar of Hymen a former well known and popular Paisley girl, Miss Nancy Hyde. They arrived in town on Wednesday and received a hearty welcome with showers of congratulatory accompaniments from their many friends here. They will take up housemaking in the new residence built by Mr. Robt. Irving on Queen St. south.

—The death of ex-warden Hilker, which took place in Guelph hospital on Sunday, will be learned of with surprise and regret throughout the county. "Harry," as he was best known, was the most popular of men, hale fellow wherever he might be, a capable business man, and in municipal life attained to the wardenship in 1908. Had he chosen to devote his attention to political life, Mr Hilker would readily have been taken up as a candidate of the Conservative party for legislative or parliamentary honors in his riding, and there is no doubt his personal popularity would have won him a seat. He was born in Port Elgin, and there spent most of his 53 years, becoming head of the general store business which was established there in the early days by his late father and partners, but which was wound up a couple of years ago. The deceased had a slight stroke of paralysis not long ago, and death was caused by a subsequent stroke. The funeral took place on Tuesday at Port Elgin.

Hints for the Home

With Nuts in Lieu of Meat.

Although many are trying to eliminate so much meat from menus on account of its soaring cost, the person who performs hard labor must have in its place something which contains the chief constituents of meat, protein and fats, or the body will not respond to the demands made upon it because of lowered vitality from lack of food elements needed. Scientific analysis has proved that nuts contain more food value to the pound than almost any other food product known. Ten cents worth of peanuts, for example, at seven cents a pound, will furnish more than twice the protein and six times more energy than could be obtained by the same outlay for a porterhouse steak at 25 cents a pound.

One reason for the tardy appreciation of the nutritive value of nuts is their reputation for indigestibility. The discomfort from eating them is often due to insufficient mastication and to the fact that they are usually eaten when not needed, as after a hearty meal or late at night, whereas, being so concentrated, they should constitute an integral part of the menu, rather than supplement an already abundant meal. They should be used in connection with more bulky carbohydrate foods, such as vegetables, fruits, bread, crackers, etc. Too concentrated nutriment is often the cause of digestive disturbance, for a certain bulkiness is essential to normal assimilation.

On a crisp winter morning a dish of nut scrapple is very appetizing and just as nutritious as that made of pork. To make it, take two cupfuls of cornmeal, one of hominy and a tablespoonful of salt, and cook in a double boiler, with just enough boiling water until it is of the consistency for frying. While still hot add two cupfuls of nut meats which have been put through the chopper, pour into buttered pan and use like other scrapple. Peanut omelette is a delicious way to serve nuts. Make a cream sauce with one tablespoonful of butter, two tablespoonfuls of flour and three-quarters of a cupful of milk, poured in slowly. Take from the fire, season, add three-quarters of a cupful of ground peanuts, and pour the mixture on the lightly-beaten yolks of three eggs. Fold in the stiffly-beaten whites, pour into a hot baking dish, and bake for twenty minutes.

Nut loaf is another good breakfast dish. Chop fine cold boiled potatoes and any other vegetables which come to hand and put in a buttered frying pan, heat quickly and thoroughly, salt to taste, and just before removing from the fire stir in lightly a large spoonful of peanut meal for each person to be served. To prepare the meal at home procure raw nuts, shell them and put in the oven just long enough to loosen the brown skin, rub these off and put the nuts through the grinder adjusted to make meal rather than an oily mixture. This put in glass jars and kept in a cool place, will be good for weeks to come. It will need no thickening for soups or sauces, or may be added in equally small quantities to breakfast muffins and griddlecakes. Potato soup, cream of pea, corn or asparagus and bean soup may be made after the ordinary receipts, omitting the butter and flour, and adding four tablespoonfuls of peanut meal.

One family had their turkey for Christmas instead of ordinary turkey, made by mixing one quart of sifted dry breadcrumbs with one pint of chopped English walnuts; any other kind of nuts will do; and one cupful of pine nuts, simply washed and dried, and adding a level teaspoonful of sage, two of salt, a tablespoonful of chopped parsley, two raw eggs, hot heaten, and sufficient water to bind the mass together. Then form into the shape of a turkey, with pieces of macaroni to form the leg bones. Brush with a little butter and bake an hour in a slow oven, and serve with drawn butter sauce. A dinner roast made of nuts and cheese contains the elements of meat. Cook two tablespoonfuls of chopped onion in a tablespoonful of butter and a little water until it is tender, then mix with it one cupful each of grated cheese, chopped English walnuts and bread crumbs, salt and pepper to taste and the juice of half a lemon; moisten with water, using that in which the onion has been cooked; put into a shallow baking dish, and brown in the oven. Hickory nut loaf is another dish which can take the place of meat at dinner. Fix two cups of rolled nuts, a cupful each of celery and milk, two cups of bread-crumbs and two eggs, season and shape, then bake twenty minutes. Serve with a gravy made like other gravy, with the addition of a teaspoonful of rolled nuts.

Peanut soup for supper on a cold night serves the double duty of stimulating the gastric juices to quick action by its warmth and furnishing protein to the body to repair its waste. Pound to a paste a cupful of nuts from which the skin has been removed, add it to a pint of milk, and scald; melt a tablespoonful of butter and mix it with a like quantity of flour, and add slowly to the milk and peanuts; cook until it thickens, and season to taste. Chestnuts, too, make a splendid soup. Boil one quart of peeled and blanched chestnuts in three pints of salt water until quite soft; pass through a sieve and add two teaspoonfuls of butter, or several tablespoonfuls of sweet cream, and season to taste. If too thick, add water.

Oatmeal nut loaf can be served cold in place of meat for Sunday night tea. Put two cups of water in a saucepan. When boiling add a cupful of oatmeal, stirring until thick; then stir in a cupful of peanuts that have been twice through the grinder, two teaspoonfuls of salt, half a teaspoonful of pepper and a tablespoonful of butter, and pack into a tin bucket with a tight-fitting lid, and steam for two hours; slice down when cold. This will keep several days if left in the covered tin and kept in a cool place. A delicious sandwich filling can be made from chopped raisins and nuts mixed with a little orange or lemon juice. Cooked prunes may be used instead of raisins.

APPROACHING PERFECTION.

London Police Compared With Those of Paris and Berlin.

In humor, in urbanity, as in perfect control of his district, the London policeman is the nearest approach to perfection, writes Mr Percival Pollard who, in "Vagabond Journeys," has a word to say of the various policemen of the world.

To the stranger, the policeman seems the politest of all Londoners. Chiefly, however, it is in his control of traffic, as heel and aloof, that he is unrivaled. When you consider the narrowness of the streets, you constantly marvel at the easy skill with which he solves his problem.

The Paris policeman never looks anything but "sloppy," and his notion of controlling traffic at crowded street crossings is enough to make the observer shout with laughter. No one minds him, and his attempts to regulate the speed of the Parisian cabby only result in a shouting match. Observation of Parisian street traffic is all that is really necessary to impress you with the belief that, in case of need, the Paris policeman would always, with much noise and melodrama, arrest the wrong person.

The police of Berlin are vastly better than those of Paris. They do not look as well, according to our notions, as the English constables, but they are fairly smart. The men are polite, control traffic reasonably, and are to that Berlin is one of the cleanest and most orderly of cities. But as reasoning individuals, the Berlin policemen are hardly to be counted at all. When anything happens to you more serious than crossing a congested street or losing your way, you are fairly certain of running hard against a city ordinance the chance to enforced to the man on the beat.

No argument or persuasion prevails. There is the regulation, and here the instrument to enforce it, the human element is entirely absent. Both Italy and France are, as to their police, more human.

WAR AND WEATHER.

Present War Does Not Differ Much From Old Campaigns.

Throughout the area of the great war, the weather from day to day is playing its part in the campaign. Modern military tactics; modern armament; modern methods of all kinds have not in any way eliminated the weather element as a factor of the greatest importance. The story of the present war does not, thus far, read so very differently from that of the stories of previous years in the same countries. In 1806, the Spanish, as related by Motley, encountered such terrible rains on the Meuse that they retreated. A previous fall of Namur in 1695 was largely due to heavy rains which prevented the English from crossing the river and meeting the besieging French army. The English in Flanders in 1708-09 endured great hardships on account of the deep snows, which blocked the roads. The cold was intense and the troops, who were short of firewood, suffered severely. The Duke of Marlborough wrote (1709): "Till this frost yields we can never break ground before our batteries nor open our trenches." The French, in Poland, in 1806-07, found mud three feet deep; drenching rains; driving sleet; melting snow and icy streams. In the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71, over the same historic ground in France, we read of torrential rains; icy roads; muddy fields, and of sufferings on account of cold.

So the story goes on, from age to age, from one war to the next. War and the weather: they are related to-day, as they were in the past, physically, physiologically, psychologically, and as they will be until war shall cease.

Fear not men who speak evil of you; fear lest you should do evil.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL STUDY

INTERNATIONAL LESSON, JANUARY 17.

Lesson III. The Call of Gideon. Judg. 6. 11-40. Golden Text, Psa. 60. 4.

Verse 11. Sat under the oak which is in Ophrah. This is an other instance of a sacred tree particularly used on a great occasion.

Gideon was beating out wheat in the winepress. A most unusual proceeding, as the wine was pressed out frequently in the inner cleft of a rock arranged in the nature of a winepress, whereas wheat was threshed out on a high place as in decated above.

To hide it from the Midianites. Everything which the Israelites possessed was in grave danger of being taken by the enemy. Under the invasion of the Canaanites, Israel's native law could be administered only in the extreme southeast, between Ramah and Bethel, where, as we found in the lesson of January 3, the palm-tree of Deborah stood. In the day of Gideon the Midianites swept south from the plain of Esdraelon, so that the use of the threshing-floors was impossible. They pushed so far that the Israelites had to hide themselves even at Ophrah. From the plain of Esdraelon a succession of open plains lead out, connected by easy passes. It is the widest avenue into both Samaria and Judea, and makes connection also with the plain of Sharon.

12. Thou mighty man of valor. Gideon was not in a particularly good mood to which that he, a man of valor—that is, a strong and active man—should have to hide himself practically in the cleft of a rock in order to thresh out a little wheat was almost as much as a hardy, strong young man could stand. The angelic visitor implied in his greeting that Gideon was not only a strong and brave man, but that he also was a devout man, a man of valor in the full sense.

13. Oh, my lord, if Jehovah is with us, why then is all this befallen us?

The angel of the Lord came with an assuring greeting. "Jehovah is with thee." Gideon was too devout to repudiate this statement. However, he was too sorely distressed not to open up the case. "If Jehovah is with the Israelites, why does he not reveal himself as he did to the men of old? The greatest revelation always in the memory of the Israelites was the fact that Jehovah brought the Israelites up out of Egypt. Gideon could not with hold the expression that Jehovah, who was with the children of Israel in Egypt, seemed now to be deserting them into the hand of Midian.

14. And Jehovah looked upon him. Here the statement is used not the angel of Jehovah, but Jehovah. Gideon's eyes are open to the real import of the message that is coming to him. It comes direct from God.

Go in this thy might and save Israel from the hand of Midian: have not I sent thee? There is no account taken of the complaint of Gideon. There is no time to argue the matter. Words are of little importance. Action is what is demanded. Gideon is made to feel immediately that he has the power to go and save Israel from the hands of the Midianites. This puts an entirely different phase on the question.

15. Oh, Lord, wherewith shall I save Israel? The thought occurs to Gideon at once, however, that he is a young man of very low origin. His family is not only the poorest in the tribe of Manasseh, but he himself is the very least in his father's house.

16. And Jehovah said unto him. Surely I will be with thee, and thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man. Again Jehovah puts no attention to the word of Gideon. His remonstrance is in vain. It matters little how poor and lowly he is. He came of a good family and had the essential characteristics for leadership. In Gideon is another illustration of the fact that God is no respecter of persons and that the true-hearted and worthy will find his favor, no matter what their condition in life happens to be.

33. Then all the Midianites and the Amalekites and the children of the east assembled themselves together. Not only was Gideon to face one horde of invaders, but all of the heathen on that side of the valley intended to make a concert against the children of Israel.

And they passed over. They immediately entered the confines of the Israelites.

And encamped in the valley of Jezreel. The word used here for valley means "deepening." It is the same as the Scotch expression "vale." It is a valley as one looks into it from above, and not a valley as one might stand below and look over an extensive plain running away from the hills far off to another rise of hills. The "deepening" or "vale," is a wide avenue running up into mountainous countries. So we read of the vale of Hebron, the vale of Elah, of Ajalon, of Jezreel. These invading armies were not going to meet the Israelites on the western border of the plain of Esdraelon by the river Kishon, but they were going to attack them more in the mountainous country and put them to disadvantage by dividing their forces and disposing of them piecemeal. Israel, therefore, had to muster not on Mount Tabor, but at Gilboa. It is interesting to note that the Midianites in their battle against Gideon took up practically the same position as the Philistines did in their battle with Saul.

36. But the Spirit of Jehovah came upon Gideon, and he blew a trumpet. Although the tribes of Israel were scattered and working independently, they could be gathered together, at a time of crisis. The blowing of the trumpet, however, was directed to the people of Gideon's own tribe. He wanted to be sure of them first. Afterward Gideon sent messengers to all the neighboring tribes, to give warning of danger and call assistance.

And Abiezer was gathered together after him. This was his own tribe. That his people, who knew him as belonging to a poor family and of humble origin, rallied to him at once must have been a sign of great encouragement and, doubtless, a real indication that Jehovah would be with him.

35. And he sent messengers throughout all Manasseh. As soon as he was sure of his own people, he sent the word everywhere. He particularly, however, sent messengers unto Asher, and unto Zebulun, and unto Naphtali; and they came up to meet them. They all came up together and were after-ward joined by a formidable army of thirty two thousand men.

36 And Gideon said unto God. The test which Gideon puts to God in this paragraph (verses 36-40) is a most striking proof of the faith which the people of the Old Testament had in their God. If he was the true God, he would show himself in some way, particularly at a time of so great crisis. The partiularity with which this test is described by the Hebrew writer shows on how great weight the chronicler put upon the incident, and also is evidence of the belief which Gideon himself had, that if he was to go out into the conflict he should go out entirely as the messenger and in the control and under the guidance of God.

DAYS OF OLD PRESS GANG.

There can be no question about it life in the Georgian navy was insufferably hard. According to Mansfield, "it was brutalizing, cruel and horrible, the kind of life now happily gone forever, a kind of life which no man of to-day would think good enough for a criminal." There was barbarous discipline, bad pay, bad food, bad hours of work, bad company.

This is putting the case strongly and to one not born or bred to the sea it is exactly what it must have seemed. How then did they get men to enter the service? There were several ways of so doing. A captain on being appointed to a vessel, besides attending to her armament and equipping her for a voyage had also the responsibility of furnishing her with a crew. He set about this by establishing a recruiting office ashore, generally at a sailors' tavern, and proceeding the fact through the town and surrounding country with the announcement that "Captain Blank, R. N., was now fitting out H. M. ship So and So for a cruise in foreign waters."

Following this came promises of unlimited rum, prize money and the King's bounty. When the gullible one came to the hall he was plied generously with drink and flattery, the King's gold jingled before his staring eyes and befuddled brain filled with stories of the joys of life in the King's navy. Finally hauled in the sea ballads of the day. That these joys were not unknown is shown by the fact that the bounty was at one time above £30.

When these gentle means failed to complete his number the captain sent a few hard lords of sturdy fellows ashore after dark in charge of an officer. This party of "pressgang" proceeded to the resorts of merchant sailors and, picked up and stragglers they found in the streets. In times of need no male between boyhood and old age was safe.

WOMAN RULERS OUT OF WAR

QUEEN WILHELMINA OF HOLLAND IS NEUTRAL.

Grand Duchess Adelaide of Luxemburg Has Tried to Keep Out of Trouble.

Queen Wilhelmina of Holland believes "discretion is the better part of valor." "Self-preservation is the first law of nature," she counselled her little cousin, the Grand Duchess Adelaide of Luxemburg, when the Germans came to her borders, after a formal protest. The Grand Duchess allowed them to go unmolested through, knowing that a threat of the German arm if she resisted would push her toy kingdom aside. Her people are prosperous and happy, knowing nothing of the terrors and horrors of war.

While Britain, Germany and France, the neighbors of Holland, are said to be spending $5,000,000 a day upon war, Holland is spending about half a million dollars a week in maintaining the victims of war. Her people gave it willingly through motives of compassion. But Queen Wilhelmina and her Government must, by the rules of war, receive it back again with interest from the Governments to whom the refugees belong. If deviated Belgium is not able to pay for board and lodging bill, the allies will have to pay it. If the war should last a year, Holland's bank account will become increased by quite a respectable sum. The longer the war, the poorer her neighbors will be, but the richer she.

She Lost Luxemburg.

Wilhelmina is not Queen as was Luxemburg because of a freak of fate. Her father ruled over it, but when he died in 1890 Luxemburg refused to set aside the law by which it was always to be governed by a male, and the grand duchy became the inheritance of the Prince of Nassau, the nearest male relative, who was made Grand Duke of Luxemburg. He on and succeeded died two years ago, leaving a family of five pretty daughters, but no son. The only heir in the male line was Count Merenberg, a grandson of the first Grand Duke, whose mother was a Russian woman married morganatically after the birth of her two children. The Countess Torby, morganatic wife of the Russian Grand Duke Michael, has always lived in England on that account, as the sister of Count Merenberg. He himself is married to the daughter of the Czar Alexander II by a morganatic marriage.

The Luxemburgers, contemplating a sovereign with such a mixture of royal blood united with the plebeian, decided finally that they too would prefer to have a woman rule over them if she were really royal, and chose the eldest daughter of their late Grand Duke. Adelaide became a sovereign upon her eighteenth birthday.

Adelaide's Betrothal.

She is a high spirited little lady, first cousin to Queen Elizabeth of the Belgians. Without any near male relatives, heads of the cousinhood of a father, brother, uncle or even cousin, she has during the past two years gone often to Brussels to ask the advice of King Albert. In the question of opposing the passage of the Kaiser's troops through her land, she went for advice to Queen Wilhelmina of Holland, and there the correspondence was woven among the sovereigns in Europe to-day.

Last year Grand Duchess Adelaide's betrothal was announced to Prince Henry of Bavaria, a nephew of the King of Bavaria, older than himself by ten years and ten days, and a good Catholic like herself and the majority of her subjects, who number altogether about a quarter of a million. Prince Henry is fighting under the flag of the German Empire, and this has had, doubtless, something to do with Grand Duchess Adelaide's acquiescence in the Kaiser's wishes.

The little Grand Duchess, in her little kingdom protected with an army of 150 soldiers, who also perform the duties of postman, fire-engineer, etc., means to be as happy and as prosperous as she can.

SHARP SAYINGS.

Even when he can't make anything else a man can generally be depended upon to make a fool of himself.

The proper time to congratulate a bride and groom is after they have lived together for at least a year and are still happy.

Luck has a perverse habit of favoring those who don't depend on it.

When a fellow makes a fool of himself he goes on the principle that what is worth doing at all is worth doing well.

Distance lends enchantment to the view, especially when we view the people we don't like.

Love is blind, or at any rate the little rascal doesn't always succeed in shooting straight.

A girl should allow her parents to pick out a husband for her. Then she can always blame it on them.

An authority on child culture has discovered that boy babies learn to talk first. That seems quite natural. A girl always wants the last word.

GENERAL JOSEPH JOFFRE

A MILITARY GENIUS, BUT NOT A DICTATOR.

He Has Shown Unexpected Efficiency, Wisdom, Patience and Strength.

France has produced in this war a military genius who has no ambition to become a military dictator.

This is an anomaly in the country's history but General Joffre is an anomaly in many respects. He is now the most interesting personality in France, the absolute ruler of its inhabitants.

Military law has superseded civil law, and a state of siege has been proclaimed throughout the land. Yet this autocrat, who holds his country's salvation or destruction in the hollow of his hand, is a simple, kindly, honest gentleman, who shuns publicity, popularity, or riches, giving his life and talents in the supreme hour of need. If he lacks the glamor of Napoleon or Bismarck, his countrymen have invested him with a rare measure of confidence and affection.

Joseph Joffre—he has but one Christian name — is in his sixty-third year, having been born on January 12, 1852, in the little town of Rivesaltes, in the Department of the Eastern Provinces, close to the Spanish frontier.

Father a Gendarme.

His father belonged to the police force and served some years as a gendarme. Joffre's personality is known through picture postcards and illustrated papers, but none of his portraits does him justice. He is one of those who "take" badly. His strong point—presence—cannot be adequately conveyed by the camera. Simplicity and straightforwardness of manner are what strike one most when meeting him for the first time.

Not a Short Man.

Picture a man somewhat above the average height—he stands five feet nine and a half inches in his stockings—of great width of shoulder, deep chested, and as straight as a dart. He is free of all movement or gesture suggestive of set military training, yet he moves with an alertness which bespeaks a nature given to decisive action. He has an old habit of striking forward with his left elbow when making a point in argument.

His photographs, when in repose, are most that of a child. A broad forehead, eyes which seem sometimes blue, sometimes hazel, looking through you as he listens, a nose to wear over-size. A strong mouth with rather large lips overhung with a brown moustache not fairly white. A deep dimple overshadowed by a firm chin—rare small and lying—so to the head a somewhat pronounced square effect; the whole face congenial, free from deep lines for a man of his age and strenuous life while hair (his) over his massive brow, head erect on a short, thick set neck, eyebrows bushy and prominent; the face almost a perfect oval. The expression is that of a man who carries out everything on the famous Latin precept, "Gentle in manner, strong in action."

Talks Little.

Last, but not least, Joffre turns the scale at 182 pounds. His muscles are as firm as those of an athlete, his capacity for physical exercise is that of a man twenty years younger.

By nature he is reserved. He will eat for hours without speaking, and when he does talk it is in a voice low and slow. Only in the intimacy of the modest little "hotel" in the Rue Michel Ange at Passy, where he has lived many years with his wife and her three children, the off spring of her first and long ago divorced husband, does he unbend.

His features express thought rather than the habit of command, but their chief charm is that they distinctly tell you the General is a man of heart. Indeed, those who know him well hold that to this quality of heart is indirectly due the slowness of the military operations in Northern France. Unlike Emperor William and his myrmidon generals, Joffre shrinks from uselessly sacrificing soldiers' lives, hence the defensive and cautious character of the trench war he is still tenaciously and patiently carrying on.

Cannot Corner This.

English engineers predict that the sun's power will soon take the place of coal for generating industrial light and heat. If this comes to pass there will be another great advantage besides the material ones. No person or organization can get a corner on the solar production of heat.

The fact that talk is cheap influences some of us to indulge in extravagant assertions.

The Darkest Hour;

Or, The Hope That Still Lived.

CHAPTER III.—(Continued)

"I think I had better take her home," he said slowly, but decisively. "She is very ill—far to ill to walk—and if she goes alone she'll probably faint again half a dozen times on the way. In ordinary, human charity I must take her. I am a doctor; in case any inquiries should be made, here is my card. I have just left a patient at Morley's Hotel." He nodded across the Square in the direction of the place he had named. The fact he had mentioned sufficiently accounted for his presence in Trafalgar Square at between three and four in the morning. "Is there a cab anywhere about?"

The constable, who had taken the card and by the light of his lantern had read on it the name and address:

Mr. Sidney Kendal, M.D.,
Ray Mead House,
Phillimore Gardens,
Kensington, W.,

had turned away, and was now busily engaged in whistling for the cab which the medical gentleman required. Even at this central spot of London a good deal of whistling proved to be necessary before a cab could be got in those deadest of dead hours between the night and the morning. At length, however, after a quarter of an hour's interval or thereabouts, a hansom rattled up and stopped against the kerb where the policeman, the doctor, and the drenched and exhausted girl were now waiting.

"She knows naught o' the wickedness o' the world, and it may be that somebody has entrapped her," said Mrs. Maitland, who had indeed been moaning to herself over and over again ever since one o'clock. "And she's sae bonnie, too! She's sae bonnie! And troubles never come single; I've kent that a' my life. Oh, Lord, if only we hadna come up here to London! If only we hadna come! Maybe she's had just sic anither accident as the poor little lassie here, only that she'll be livin' in a hospital whaur I canna get to her. Oh, dear! oh, dear! Folks is right enough when they wunna let their kin and freends awa' to London. It's [illegible] enough the land doun wha lore gets [illegible] oh, my little lass!"

From the garret the [illegible] could not hear the arrival of a hansom at the street door of the house. But her hearing faculty, sorely failing though it was, was keen enough to catch footsteps on the stair leading up to the bare little room that was her only place in all London that Maggie could call home. But the footsteps were surely not those for which she had so long been waiting with a fast-beating heart; they were heavier footsteps than Maggie's, they seemed so heavy, indeed, as a man's. Hurrying to the door she opened it just in time to admit a man in very truth, a portly, white-bearded man, who was carrying a burden in his arms. And that burden was Maggie, faint again, and startlingly pale. And her soaked clothing dripped water on the floor as if she had just been rescued from the river, instead of only from the rain.

"What's happened to her? she's no' dead, is she?" the bent old woman asked in a panic of sudden dread.

"No," the white-bearded man answered cheerily. "She has only fainted. I'll lay her down on the bed, and then you can attend to her. Where is the bed? Shall I put her down here? Can you move the child?"

He had borne his light human burden to the narrow little bed on which Alice was lying; Alice, changed and white, who seemed to be half asleep, and yet was keeping up a low, continual moaning like the moaning of a dreamer whose dreams have in them stabs of pain. Mrs. Maitland started forward with new tears streaming suddenly from her faded old eyes that were already red with many hours of weeping.

"I canna move the child," she said brokenly. "Nobody can move her. Nobody will ever be able to move her from her bed any more. She was knocked down in the street in the afternoon—it was quite close here, just out in Edgware Road—and a cart-wheel went over her, and the doctor that was fetched said her spine was injured, and that she'll never be well again. He said she'd maybe never stand up right again."

And so it came about that it was only by first gleams of the next morning's daylight that Maggie Maitland read the lover's letter which had arrived here for her by the first post of the morning before. She had to stand close by the [illegible] small window to read it. Mrs. Maitland and Alice were both sleeping; the old mother had only fallen asleep about half an hour ago, worn out with the duties and the extremities of the night; there was no fear of her waking yet. And the little girl, God help her! Maggie did not know as yet that anything strange or tragic had befallen her. So the older girl stood by the window and read the message of love for which she had longed through weeks and weeks of silence.

The old mother stirred in her sleep. Then the faint sound of the girl's movements by the window roused her completely. She sat up on the floor, in the place where she had been lying, and pushed back the blanket that had covered her.

"Maggie, dearie," she said, "I've been dreaming o' that bit of embroidery that was found wrapped about you when my good man came upon you at the foot o' the tree. I dreamt we sold it for a terrible lot o' money—more than ever a body'll think a bit of embroidery could be worth. And I'm thinking that that's what we shall have to do now, Maggie. We shall have to sell it to get money for Alice and for you, too, dearie. And I'm just breaking my heart at thought of it, because I'd hoped an' hoped we'd be able to keep it until some day we'd learn by it who your ain people are—your ain father and mother that left ye to die by the roadside, and that never seek to know whether ye're living now or dead."

CHAPTER IV.

Yet, perhaps it is a matter for rejoicing that the future is hidden from us by an impenetrable veil. Certainly, had she only known it, it was a matter for rejoicing to Mrs. Crookenden that she could not look into the future at the moment in which the fair, boyish-faced, but shamed and worn, young fellow whom the clerk had announced as "Mr. Ronald," entered her presence in her private room at her dingy Lombard Street offices, barely two or three moments after her interview with her broker, Mr. Ferdinand Pocock; after the interview, during which she had coolly informed her broker to his consternation that she knew it was he who was responsible for the attempted poisoning of Brian Hardy at the dinner recently given at a fashionable restaurant by Mr. Wimpole Sturgess, the eminent lawyer.

The face of the woman financier had hardened a little at the entrance of the youth Ronald. She had found out by experience that he needed to be repressed rather than encouraged, and she accordingly began the work of repression by starting to talk with him on business only.

"Well, have you found any young men or women of the kind I want—spies, as you choose to call them?"

Mr. Ronald shook his head, while a fierce light leapt into his ashamed and hungry-looking blue eyes.

"No," he answered her hoarsely. "I can't find people dishonest enough and unscrupulous enough to suit you."

Mrs. Crookenden smiled.

"That is probably true," she said quite calmly and quietly, and without a touch of resentment in her voice. "But they have to be made suitable. Have you found anybody that looks as if he might be made suitable without too much trouble?"

The fair-faced, boyish-looking youth who was Christine Dare's brother strode across the room and back before he answered. Then at length, seemingly under the compulsion of her eyes, he spoke.

"Yes," he said, slowly, and apparently with difficulty. "I have found one who will do. He is not much older than I am. He is a clerk in a bank, and he was talking to me the other day about betting. It wouldn't take much to make him embezzle for the sake of a likely bet or two—I've found out that much."

"Then you may consider that you have the job," the Money Queen said, with a slight, curious smile. "And it is a job that has money in it, as you know."

"It's a job that's got a curse on it," the youth retorted passionately.

Mrs. Crookenden smiled again.

"So is every job which gets a man or a woman on in the world, my boy," said she coolly.

A spasm passed over the youth's face.

"How cruel you are! Oh, heaven, how cruel you are!" he cried bitterly and fiercely, in a tone which told her that in his heart he was trying to thrust her from him. "What a fearful coil of dishonor a man gets into who is beguiled by your face and your voice into trying to win your favor by doing your will. I thought you were a star, a very angel of light and of power, and I find you are a fiend in human shape—a fiend!"

"I am afraid it is a little late to find that out," the famous woman who was still in lamentable fact his star, even though an evil one, responded contemptuously with her icy smile. "And we will not talk this nonsense if you please. I have no time to waste in the discussion of your feelings. You will have the goodness to remember that in this office I am a business woman, and nothing else. What is the name of this young clerk you have spoken of as a person of promise for my service?"

The fair-faced, fair-haired boy was pacing the floor again with his blue eyes newly alight, and with his cheeks and lips a shade whiter than they had been five minutes before. There was no mistaking the fact that he was racked by intense agitation.

"What is his name? The fellow calls himself Harry Lewisham," he answered her question as he paced. "I suppose he must be Henry really, but he always calls himself Harry. He's a rather good-looking chap, about my age. He's been in the bank four or five years, and has always been honest as the day. But he is an eager, passionate, hot-headed sort of chap, and it wouldn't take much to turn him on to the wrong road, especially if the person doing it took care not to let him see that the game, whatever it was, would end in dishonesty. I've begun the accursed work already. I began it yesterday, and did it well, too, although I loathed and despised myself for doing it. He's got a lot of money put by, £50 or £60 I believe the amount is, and it wouldn't take more than five minutes of clever persuasion to make him risk it on a horse. Of course I'd tell him I'd got a tip about some wretched outsider that was going to run somewhere, and then he'd lose the money and some more on the top of it, which he wouldn't be able to pay. And then I'd suggest to him, quite quietly and easily, that instead of the man he was in debt to going and telling the Bank people what he'd been up to, mightn't he just borrow a trifle without permission from the money that passed through his hands at the Bank, and [illegible] to lay on a better horse, so that he might have a chance of winning a lump sum sufficient to cover and clear up the whole business. He is innocent enough—fool enough, as you call it—to believe that he'd be certain to win the second time. And so he'll take my suggestion and borrow privately from the Bank, but only to lose again, and be found out, and be threatened with public conviction, and penal servitude. He'll be ruined then, of course. People who employ young men can forgive a good deal, but they never forgive embezzlement. The boy will be ruined for ever, just as I've been ruined. And for the same reason—just that you—you who by reason of the world's blindness and of its money-worship are at present perhaps the person of strongest influence in all the city of London—may get hold of another miserable human creature to do your dirty work for you, the dirty work of which your elegant, fashionable world never dreams."

He broke off panting. His words had been quickly, wildly, and almost incoherently spoken, jumbled together into sharp and bold sentences. Still smiling coldly the handsome, stately woman before him nodded approval of the course of procedure which he had mentioned.

"The plan you have set forth would answer the purpose admirably," she said gravely. "But a few changes may be made in it with advantage. Listen here!"

She leaned forward. "It is true that this young man will owe me much if I save him when he is threatened with a public accusation and trial. I should save him by the method of your informing him that you have the honor of my personal friendship, and that you will appeal to me on his behalf, as you have no doubt that my influence with the Bank Managers and Directors is powerful enough to make them abandon the intention of prosecuting if I should wish it. In this case, it is true, he would owe me much. But there is another case in which he would owe me yet more, and this is by the method of his confiding his felony to me alone, and of my lending him the money to replace the sums he has stolen, and so covering up his sin that the bank authorities shall never come to know of it at all. By this method he would owe me more, and I should consequently have him absolutely in my power; while at the same time he can remain in his employment with the secret of his guilt known only to myself and you, and can do my work in his free time in the evenings, on Saturday afternoons and Sundays. This is a better way, and is the way in which I want the work carried through. It will place him the more utterly in my power, so that he will have to work for me the harder. Do you understand?"

"He will be so much in your power that he will have to swallow his loathing and bitterness as best he may?"

"Yes."

The words seemed to have been torn from him. The millionaire woman made a gesture of dismissal.

"Very well, then. That is all I have to say to you. Good-morning!"

But this particular visitor, although a young man who looked almost too easily led, was in this hour bold enough and desperate enough to fight against her command.

"Not for a moment," he said to her hoarsely. "You must listen to me for a moment more. I will not be sent away like this as if I was a dog, or the commonest hireling clerk who entered your employment but yesterday. They may all quake before you, but I will not. Long ago, you encouraged me to love you, and so you must hear me with patience, for I am your lover still. If you will not now see me in private at Grosvenor Square, why, you shall listen to me here. I made up my mind about this last night while I lay awake through the long hours. If I had not made up my mind about it—if I had not resolved to force you to hear me here, in this office, at the end of our business interview this morning—I should have shot myself, or else have got up and gone out and thrown myself off one of the bridges in my utter misery and despair. Why do you look at me so coldly and angrily? Do you forget that a year ago you said you loved me, and that you would always love me to the end of time?"

"Of course, I know that such words mean little or nothing to you," he hurried on, forestalling the answering speech that had formed itself upon her lips. "Of course, I know—how should I not know it—that you have said the same thing to scores of other men, who are now no more to you than the pavement under your cruel feet. I dare say you are saying the same thing to some man even now, perhaps, even to a new worshipper every day. It does not matter to you who they are, nor how many, provided only that they are men who can help you with some of your thousand schemes. [illegible] I have a greater claim on you than most of them by reason of the fact that I have suffered more at your hands than have the others."

She tried to thrust him from her, but his desperation gave him strength and adroitness, and he clung to her with an iron hand. She put her hand out towards the electric bell that was connected with the writing table at which she sat, but something in his face seemed to restrain her from ringing.

"You had better not ring," he said in a tone that had a threat in it. "I am glad you see the wisdom of not summoning a third party to hear my beseeching and my reproaches. Even you, who are so bold and self-confident that it would seem that you could face anything—even you could not afford to have all my story become known to the world. You could not afford to have me tell in public how you, a woman over forty, pretended to love me, a boy scarcely over twenty, and by that means beguiled me into such self-inflicted dishonor as perhaps no son of an honorable gentleman ever stooped to before. I have become a son whom no true-bred British father, no true-bred British mother could any longer acknowledge except with shame. I have deserted from the army—better a thousand times I had shot myself when first the ignominious thought of such an act ever entered my love-maddened soul. I have made my name anathema to all right-minded men and women. Destitute, homeless, and with the fear of recognition always upon me, I have had to drop that name, and skulk about the slums of London under an alias, the while I earn money enough to keep my miserable life in my body by doing work which sinks me lower still in the social scale and in the scale of honor—the dirty, infamous work of spying on people in high places in order that you may, unknown to them, have a knowledge of their private life and their private doings, which shall enable you to influence them and cheat them to the fill of your pitiless heart's greedy desire. You see me here a human wreck, a treacherous scoundrel, of your own making. In the beginning I was fool enough to think that at least you truly loved me, and that at least, therefore, I should have in return for my bitter self-disgrace such consolation as a woman's passionate love would give me. But now I have found out that even that miserable comfort was only a foolish self-delusion."

At this juncture the woman financier laughed aloud.

"You did not expect me to marry you, did you?" she asked with a cruel mockery in her tone.

The boy sprang up then from his humbly entreating attitude, and confronted her with the light of a desperate and dangerous anger in his once candid young eyes.

"Yes. When I slunk out of the army for your sake, I did expect that you would marry me," he dared to say defiantly.

His voice and his manner alike had a touch of the old dignity, which his recent skulking about the byways of the great city had stripped from him. Mrs. Crookenden's face did not soften, however, as she looked at him.

"I should have thought your common sense would have told you that a woman in my position could not marry a disgraced man," she retorted with a sneer that wounded sharply as a knife.

The desperate young fellow, whose life she had brought to utter shipwreck, started forward almost as if he would strike her. But he recovered his self-control in an instant, and drew back again, moving unsteadily, and with his clear-cut young features looking curiously old by reason of the mark upon him of the conflict of anger and despair which was still raging in his breast.

A Real Canadian Contingent at Salisbury Plain.

Appropriate.

A wealthy but miserly baronet was celebrated for having a magnificently decorated dining-room, while his viands were very few. A celebrated wit was invited to dine on a certain occasion, and the host asked him if he didn't think the room elegant.

"Yes," was the reply, "but it is not quite to my taste."

"And what change would you make?" asked the host.

"Well," answered the wit, "if this were my house, you know, I would have," looking at the ceiling, "less gilding and," here he glanced furtively at the table, "more carving."

TURKEY'S WAR STRENGTH.

Little Information Has Been So Far Available.

The advent of Turkey into the field of hostilities has aroused some interest as to what she may be able to do, but so far little information has been available. In the Scientific American a military authority endeavors to supply some of the facts, as follows:

There is probably no army regarding which it is more difficult to make any definite statement of strength than that of Turkey. The estimates of the total number of men, fully armed and equipped, that Turkey can put in the field vary all the way from over 1,200,000 to 500,000, the latter being the estimate of certain military men in the United States army, whose opportunities for gathering information on this subject are unusually favorable.

In 1910 there was undertaken a revision of the whole military system, and at that time the term of service was 20 years, from the age of 20 to the age of 40, for all Ottoman subjects. Formerly Christian subjects of the Ottoman Empire were exempt, but had to pay an exoneration tax; to-day, unless a change has recently been made, Christians are subject to service.

In 1910 the total war strength of the infantry was given as about 1,500,000 rifles, with other troops in proportion; but it is quite unlikely that such a force existed anywhere but on paper.

When the war broke out, the reorganization and re-equipping of the Ottoman army under the German general, von der Goltz, was under way, but far from complete; and there is no doubt that the sudden declaration of war by the Balkan States found the Turks at a disadvantage of unpreparedness, comparable to that of the French when the German troops poured across the neutral lands of Belgium.

The crushing series of defeats of the Turks wrought havoc in their army. Some of the best regiments were all but annihilated, a vast amount of artillery and general equipment was captured or destroyed, and, worst of all, a serious blow was struck at the morale and prestige of the whole army.

In the interval since that war, the Government, with German assistance, has been carrying on the reorganization. How far this has progressed, and just what is the effective strength, it is difficult to say.

Anything in That Line.

Grateful Patient—Doctor, how can I ever repay you for your kindness to me?

"And you say you ate horse steak during the siege of Paris? How was it served?" "A la carte, of course."

"Say, Pa," said little Johnny, "what do they mean by 'vulgar ostentation'?" "Vulgar ostentation, my son," said his father, who had not lived 50 years for nothing, "is the display made by people who have more money to make it than we have."

BRITISH GIVE FOE MERCY

BUT THE GERMANS ARE NOT SO CONSIDERATE.

Soldier Writes of Experiences—Hussar Pays Tribute to Aviator's Bravery.

Sheffield is hearing from her sons at the front.

Private A. Gooderham, who is in the 2nd Yorkshire Regiment, and lives in Sheffield, England, writes home to his mother that he has been wounded in the hand.

"The fighting is going on all the time," he adds, "and there is not much chance to rest. We lost our colonel and that upset all the battalion as he was a real good fellow. We lie in the trenches and if we get up just to have a look round they get in a shot at us and they are sending big shells over our trenches all the time. The holes these shells make you could bury a horse and cart in. It makes you very sad to see the people leaving their homes and the Germans destroying the places. When the poor folks return they find their homes all burnt to the ground. But never mind, God is making them suffer for it now.

Enemy Losing Thousands.

"The Germans must be losing thousands of men. By the time you receive this letter I expect I shall be right well and ready for another pot at the Germans. They have lots of lads about 15 years of age and men of 50. It is a shame to have such young ones at the front and when you get them they shout for mercy. The English give them mercy, but some of the Germans when they get our fellows don't give them much mercy."

A son of J. Wilson, 76 Brocco Bank, was with the London Scottish in their celebrated charge, and says:

"We had about a day and a night of it with rather heavy losses. The majority, I am pleased to say, were not very heavily wounded. I was glad to get away from the German artillery fire, which was very warm stuff. We are now away from it and having a good rest; plenty of grub and a comparatively good time."

"Cannot Be a Long War."

Alfred Lucas has received an interesting letter from R. Hammond, who joined the artillery on the outbreak of the war. He writes:—

"We have been in the thick of the fighting along the Yser lately. Several of my lot, myself included, who are artillery men, are attached to the R.F.A., and we had a hot time of it. The enemy made determined efforts to silence our guns, but without success, and although we lost heavily ourselves, my battery especially, the slaughter of the Germans was awful. Only those who have witnessed the terrible effects of modern warfare can imagine the horrible slaughter and suffering which it entails; it was like some horrifying nightmare. Dante's Inferno at its worst is a mere nothing compared to it. We have now come down to the base to recuperate for a day or so, and we welcome the rest. The Germans are not all alike; in their attack upon us they advanced with great bravery and rushed to certain death unflinchingly. We learn very little here of the progress of the allies generally, as we have had no newspapers for a long time, but I venture the opinion that in view of the enormous expenditure and slaughter that is going on daily it cannot be a long war."

Hussars' Hot Time.

Fred Cocking, a trumpeter of the 2nd Dragoon Guards, whose home is at Matlock, writes to his parents:—"The 11th Hussars caught it hot to-day. We don't know how many have gone under, as they are buried in their own trenches. The Germans got the range with their big guns and dropped shells right into the trenches. They belong to our brigade and have been very lucky until to-day. Our airmen have been doing fine work lately. They take more chances than anybody by flying right over the German trenches, and direct our artillery fire by dropping differently colored lights. My word! Talk about being under fire. They get it under, over and all around, but an aeroplane on the move takes some hitting. If people want to know what it is like out here let them join the army and try it. It might surprise a few. Hell on earth isn't in it. There has been one continued roar of artillery and rifle fire all last night and to-day, and it is still on. Recently we had another black day, losing 14 killed, including our C.O., Major Browning, and another officer, 49 wounded and two missing. We had 34 casualties in our squadron."

"The Lord will provide" is about as far as many a lazy man's religion ever gets.

HOME TRAINING

A Cleveland police official emphasizes the fact that crime and disorder are largely due to lack of proper home training. The Toronto Star Weekly observes that it is one of those obvious truths that are admitted and yet not fully realized. Some movements which are good in themselves have a tendency to diminish parental responsibility. Where education is free and, even compulsory, there is a disposition to shift that responsibility to the teacher; and one sometimes hears the contention that crime is due to lack of moral training in the schools. In a well-conducted school there must, of course, be a large amount of moral training, direct or indirect. But the teacher has not control over the child in the evenings, on Saturdays and Sundays, and the holidays, which occupy nearly three months of the year. Here the quality of home training is of the highest importance.

And none of those movements, such as boy scouts or girl guides, however good, can take the place of the home. They should, in fact, all be directed to building up the home and training children for parentage, as well as for other duties. The well-trained boy should be a better father as well as a better citizen.

A good home does not mean a household ruled with severity, and with supression of childish individuality. There is no better training than reasonable freedom combined with a sense of responsibility, cultivated at the earliest possible age. Obedience is none the less valuable if rendered for a reason. If children are made to understand that certain indulgences are forbidden, not because they are wrong in themselves, but because of the limitations of the family income, they learn one of the lessons of life. They become partakers in the responsibility for the wise expenditure of the income.

The good home is a cheerful home, not a dismal place from which children fly for diversion. It is a home in which questions of general human interest are discussed, not the failings of neighbors and servants. It is a home in which children are not suppressed, but invited to express themselves freely and intelligently—not to 'show off' and try to show superiority over others. In other words, the good home is a place of training for the activities and responsibilities of the world.

WOMEN WHO ARE ALWAYS TIRED

May Find Help in This Letter.

Swan Creek, Mich.—"I cannot speak too highly of your medicine. When through neglect or overwork I get run down and my appetite is poor and I have that weak, languid, always tired feeling, I get a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and it builds me up, gives me strength, and restores me to perfect health again. It is truly a great blessing to women, and I cannot speak too highly of it. I take pleasure in recommending it to others."—Mrs. Annie Cameron, R.F.D., No. 1, Swan Creek, Michigan.

Another Sufferer Relieved.

Hebron, Me.—"Before taking your remedies I was all run down, discouraged and had female weakness. I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and used the Sanative Wash, and find today that I am an entirely new woman, ready and willing to do my housework now, where before taking your medicine it was a dread. I try to impress upon the minds of all ailing women I meet the benefits they can derive from your medicines."—Mrs. Charles Rowe, R. F. D., No. 1, Hebron, Maine.

If you want special advice write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co., (confidential) Lynn, Mass. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

HIS HEALTH IN A TERRIBLE STATE

HAGERSVILLE, ONT., Aug. 26th 1913.

"About two years ago, I found my health in a very bad state. My Kidneys were not doing their work and I was all run down in condition. I felt the need of some good remedy, and having seen "Fruit-a-tives" advertised, I decided to try them. Their effect, I found more than satisfactory.

Their action was mild and the result all that could be expected.

My Kidneys resumed their normal action after I had taken upwards of a dozen boxes, and I regained my old-time vitality. Today, I am enjoying the best health I have ever had".

B. A. KELLY

"Fruit-a-tives" is the greatest Kidney Remedy in the world. It acts on the bowels and skin as well as on the kidneys, and thereby soothes and cures any Kidney soreness.

KAISER BILL

Who was it thought that he'd rule the world,
And walk o'er it with flags unfurled,
And into war all Europe hurled?
Why, Kaiser Bill.

Who dreamt of empires wide and great,
Said all the world be sure could take,
And left destruction in his wake?
Why, Kaiser Bill.

Who said that he would win great fame,
With innocent blood he wrote his name
Till all the world was crying "shame"?
Why, Kaiser Bill.

Who was it wrecked their happy homes,
Made mothers, wives and children mourn,
Moved all the world to hate and scorn?
Why, Kaiser Bill.

Who is it goes down on bended knee,
Then goes and shocks humanity?
Why, Kaiser Bill.

Who made this world a living hell,
Wrecked towns and lives with shot and shell,
Who'll get a place where—I won't tell?
Why, Kaiser Bill.

For clouds are gathering in the gloom,
Retribution will come soon,
Who surely then will meet his doom?
Why, Kaiser Bill.

And when, on St Helena's shore,
From Germany banned forevermore,
Oft will he think of days of yore,
Old Kaiser Bill.

And when empires great run through his mind,
Or to rule the world he feels inclined,
Then will he think of one confined against his will,
And think of loved ones left behind,
Old Kaiser Bill.

Now the moral it is very plain—
When to this world you seek great fame,
Just make quite sure you are not insane,
Like Kaiser Bill.

TEMPLE—RUSHTON

A pretty wedding took place at 5 o'clock Wednesday evening, January 6th, at the home of Mr and Mrs Jas Rushton, Willow Lane Farm, Dobbiston, when their second daughter Myrtle was united in marriage with Mr Eben T Temple, son of Mr and Mrs William Temple, of Washada, Man. Rev R L Ockley conducted the ceremony and Miss Zetta Rushton, sister of the bride, rendered the bridal chorus from Lohengrin. The bride, who was given away by her father, looked lovely in a gown of ivory satin with overdress of silk embroidered net trimmed with pearls and roses, and carried a sheaf of bridal roses and maiden hair fern, her veil being arranged with lily of the valley. Miss Edna Temple, sister of the groom, acted as bridesmaid and was gowned in pale blue silk crepe de chene trimmed with pink rose buds and carried a boquet of pink sweet peas. Mr Arthur Rushton brother of the bride assisted the groom. Following congratulations dinner was served, the table being beautifully decorated with a fountain of pink and white carnations and asperges fern. The guests numbering about forty, spent the evening in music and games. The groom's gift to the bride was a pearl necklace, to the bridesmaid a pearl and amethyst brooch, to the groomsman a pearl tie pin and the pianist a brooch set with pearls. Mr and Mrs Temple will shortly take up their residence in Washada, Man.

THOSE POOR OLD FRIENDS

Every year a procession of tired, worn-out old horses marches wearily from all parts of England to the docks of London, Leith, Newcastle, Goole, Grimsby and Hull, writes Capt. the Hon. A. C. Murray, M. P., in London Answers.

Poor old fellows they are, too! Old hunters, some of them, who have followed the hounds on many a bright morning with never a "baulk" at the stiffest fence. Here and there may be seen a stocky little pony, who for years has taken the kiddies of the family out in a governess cart—and brought them home, too!—willingly and safely. A few sturdy Clydesdales, who have served their masters faithfully and long at many a ploughing and harvest, also take part in this sad march past.

Their Grim Old Age.

You might, perhaps, think that these faithful beasts, these old friends, are wending their way to some happy grazing ground where, after their years of faithful service, they will be allowed to pass the remainder of their days in happiness and peace—that this procession is one of honor, both to them and their masters.

But it is neither. On the contrary, outside England it is known as "England's Shame." In England itself it is called the "traffic in old horses."

In everyday life, in sport and war, our horses have taken their share. True, the pick of British horses are bought by foreigners, and pass their days in comfort. But what happens to the ordinary "middle-class" horse when he becomes too old and tired to hunt, to plough, or to pull the governess cart?

He is allowed by his affectionate master or mistress to pass into the hands of Continental dealers in horseflesh—callous brutes, for the most part, without one spark of kindly feeling for the old horse, whose only interest in him is the price he will fetch in the meat market.

One would think that this last journey would, at least, be made as comfortable as possible, but, to our everlasting shame, the exact opposite is the case. Many boats are employed in this traffic, but only one—the Harrowgate, owned by Messrs. Wilson—is fitted especially for carrying horses.

With Sticks and Knives.

In the majority of cases, stacks of hay may be seen on board these boats—in compliance with the Board of Trade regulations—but there they remain, voyage after voyage; for not one mouthful of fodder or water is given to the poor brutes from one end of the miserable journey to the other.

On arriving at Antwerp, some with eyes gouged out, and many lamed and bleeding from the frightened struggle on board, the weary old things are driven through the streets of the town to the quarantine stable, four and a half miles away.

Here they are examined by a veterinary surgeon. Those considered fit for human consumption have a hole punched in one ear in which a metal button is clenched. This button has to be returned within ten days, and the amount of suffering inflicted on the frightened, half-starved, ill-treated animals during that period may be left to the imagination. Even then, many of the buttons do not come back, which means that the unhappy beasts have been doomed to drag out still more time, working for masters without pity, in a state of sickness, hunger and misery.

After leaving the quarantine stable at Antwerp they have to trudge, perhaps, thirty miles to some town inland, their wearied bodies kept moving by drovers armed with sticks and knives, which they use unmercifully.

The Shame of England.

Others may go a three or four days' journey by train, herded together anyhow, without one drop of water or one bite of food.

No wonder this traffic is called "the shame of England" by those who witness the ill-treatment of old English horses in Belgium! What a reward for faithful service—what a trade for a nation of horsemen to be mixed up in!

At Antwerp, where the horses are killed with a poleaxe, generally blunt, they may be seen to fall screaming to the ground—and anyone who has heard a horse scream will never forget it! At Ghent thousands of horses are killed every year with sledge hammers, while in most of the private slaughter-houses a knife is used!

Last year fifty thousand horses were condemned in this way. Of these, forty-four thousand were valued at under £10, which puts them in the "decrepit horse" class.

Will Parliament Act?

So callous to suffering do the men engaged in this trade become that a Government veterinary surgeon said the other day at Antwerp that though he had the right to send back to England any horse suffering from glanders or mange he never did so, as they would only be thrown overboard—alive!—to save the trouble and expense of a profitless journey.

Surely it is time that all Britishers, men and women, put a stop to this heartless trade—a trade that is a disgrace to all concerned, but the greatest of all to us in England, who profess to love the horse.

At least we might make it our business to see that these poor beasts, who have served us so long and faithfully, should die painlessly.

BARBED WIRE IN WAR.

Stop Bayonet Charges and Hinder Cavalry.

With the aeroplane and motor traction, barbed wire is among the latest innovations of modern warfare, and in order to appreciate the difficulties which our soldiers have to face in attacking a German position it is necessary to know exactly what these wire obstructions are, and the conditions under which they are used.

There are two classes of wire entanglements, namely, high and low, and both possess that essential of all temporary field fortifications—simplicity and ease of construction.

High entanglements are most commonly used to protect trenches against bayonet charges. For this purpose stout stakes some five feet long are used. They are planted in the ground about six feet apart in rows in front of the trenches, which it is desired to shield from assault. If time and material permit at least six rows are driven in, and sometimes the stakes are made more secure by being fastened by lengths of wire to huddles or pegs. Each stake is then connected to every other stake around it with numerous lengths of barbed wire arranged horizontally and diagonally.

A line of trenches so defended is, with reason, regarded as impregnable against a frontal attack unless its defenders have been completely demoralized by well-directed artillery fire. Entanglements of wires can be demolished in a very few minutes by men equipped with pliers. But in the face of a rapid fire from magazine rifles at practically point-blank range it is few moments would suffice for the annihilation of whole regiments.

The low wire entanglements are designed almost exclusively as cavalry obstacles. Pegs, eighteen inches or two feet long, are driven into the ground in rows a few feet apart, and the barbed wire is fixed between them so as to form a sort of network. In its simplest form the low wire obstacles consists merely of a trip wire.

In either shape it is frequently fixed along long grass so as to be concealed. The low entanglement is calculated to bring down horse and rider, but from a humanitarian point of view it is a considerable improvement on the cruel obstacles formerly used against cavalry.

THE PURSUIT OF HEALTH.

Story of the Man Who Followed the Doctor's Orders.

Along the pike I sadly bike, clear to the county's borders; o'er sand and rock I daily walk—it is the doctor's orders. O'er hill and dale I hit the trail, and sigh, "If Heaven pleases, this honest toil, close to the soil, will cure my twelve diseases." The farmer's pup would eat me up, and chase me over the ridges; I'm full of scars where motor-cars have knocked me off the bridges. But still I toil across the soil, where grinning jays behold me, until I flame my withered frame because the doctor told me.

The doc's command! When them he hands down from his whiskered jawbones, the patient bows and makes his vows that he'll obey the sawbones. No prince or king on earth, by jing! can make the people mind him, like our old doc; we never balk, but just obey, dad blind him!

He feels my wrist and mutters, "Hist! Your heart is out of kilter; your lungs are punk this is no bunc—your kidneys do not filter. You live too high, eat too much pie and porterhouse and cutlets; you'll have to change your habits strange, like other pampered muttleta. Hereafter eat a cold raw beet, which will sustain and cheer you, and when you're dry just cast your eye upon that hydrant near you."

No other guy beneath the sky could make me do his bidding. I'd say, "Olds death! Conserve your breath! I'm weary of your kidding!" But when the doc makes such a talk I argue not nor question; I live on straw and hay and slaw, and jar up my digestion. For days and weeks I live on leeks and barks and leaves and grasses, while neighbors boast the luscious roast and buckwheats and molasses.

Folks say to me, "Oh, bully chee! Why all these crazy suctions?" And I reply with heartfelt sigh, "It is the doc's instructions!"

No wave of sympathy should ever be allowed to burst the dykes of prudence.

MAHARAJAH OF GWALIOR.

According to Report He Is Said to Be a Remarkable Man.

For sheer versatility, for devotion to work, and for fearlessness in sport, says Saint Nehal Sing in the Strand Magazine, the Maharajah of Gwalior is unexcelled among the maharajahs. He can carry in his head the minutest details of the administration of his state, which is more than 25,000 square miles in area—about twice the size of brave Belgium. He can do the work of the lowest clerk in his employ in the remotest part of his dominion, or perform the most complicated tasks of his highest-paid official. With equal facility he can discharge the duties of the trooper or infantryman of his army, or can head the brilliant column of his military forces. With perfect sangfroid he can jump into the driver's cab and pilot a heavily laden railway train over the steepest gradients and around the most treacherous curves. For him to see a broken-down motorcar is to feel his fingers twitching to put it into action. And he is no mere mechanic, but is an inventor as well.

I have been told of times when this ruler—only 38 years old at the present time—has sat through the best part of the night puzzling over the details of revenue and expenditure of his state, jumped in the morning on the engine and taken a party of distinguished hunters over the mountainside into the jungle, and spent the whole day stalking lions and tigers from an elephant's back.

On one such occasion he and three other friends were riding on the back of an elephant in a sort of balanced saddle. The maharajah was placed on one side of the howdah along with another heavy-set hunter, while two lightweights sat together on the other side. Without warning, just as a tiger had been struck with a bullet, but had rushed away into the jungle unseen, the howdah and saddle suddenly lurched, throwing out the maharajah. The elephant plunged ahead, leaving his helpless men still clung to his rifle, sprawling on the ground. Without hesitation a moment he ran into the thick for cat after the disappearing beast, and was not again seen until late at night. Then, when his comrades were beginning to grow frantic at his long-continued absence in such circumstances, he suddenly appeared, hot on along the skin of the tiger, which he had relentlessly pursued on foot, shot, and flayed with his own hands.

IS SMOKING HARMFUL?

It All Depends on the Man Using Tobacco.

Until manhood is reached and full growth attained there is not the slightest doubt that the use of tobacco is decidedly harmful. It often arrests growth, and is the cause of many youths being underrated and under-developed generally. It interferes with mental alertness and intelligence, and might very properly be blamed for many a man's failure to get on in life at a time when he should have been keen, ambitious, mentally active and industrious. But provided a man has attained his full growth he should suffer no ill effects so long as he continues to smoke in moderation. The amount of tobacco which is implied by the term moderation varies so much that every man must decide by his own experience how it is to be interpreted in his case. It is a remarkable but perfectly well recognized fact that one may be able to smoke four times as much as another without injury. The healthful amount of smoking will be found to soothe the nerves, and, when indulged after eating, to stimulate the digestion gently and to remove the unpleasant sensation of fulness.

Where smoking is carried to excess there may be a continuous dryness of the mouth, and an inflamed condition of the mucous membrane of the throat, which causes a tickling cough. Other signs are dyspepsia, nervousness, a fluttering of the heart, and sometimes trembling of the hands. In bad cases the eyesight is affected, and serious heart trouble may result. As a rule all these symptoms disappear entirely when smoking is given up, and as long as indulgence in tobacco is kept within the bounds of moderation a man is quite free from them. In cases of the amount being exceeded a man should decide exactly how much he can use and stick firmly to it, counting out his pipefuls and cigarettes, and resolving not to go beyond the number fixed upon. It is a matter of will power entirely, and if he has any regard for his health he must exercise his determination.—A Physician.

FOE'S ERRORS OF STRATEGY

BELGIUM'S INVASION A GOOD THING FOR FRANCE.

The Kaiser's Staff Made the Vital Blunder of Underrating Opponents.

In the Bulletin des Francais, published at Bordeaux, France, there appears in an issue of the present month an interesting comment on German strategy in the present war. The caption of the article is "German Strategic Errors," and in it is pointed out what are considered to be, from a French standpoint, Germany's greatest military errors up to the latter part of November. The article as translated is in part as follows:

"It appears that the German General Staff has begun to pay for the great mistake made in the preparation of its war plans, which was to underestimate the worth of Germany's adversaries. The Germans permitted themselves to be persuaded by Pan-German fables concerning the alleged undisciplined condition of the French soldiers, the miserably insufficient preparedness of the English, the supposedly poorly organized Russian Army as judged by the Manchurian campaigns, and, finally, the worth of the little Belgian National Guard. Drunken with self-confidence they thought, 'Is there an enemy we have not conquered?'

Presumed Too Much.

"Their plan has always shown a singularly impertinent presumption. We can muster, if that is their inspired literature concerning the war long of France in six weeks, after which they would execute a gigantic right about face, attack the Russians and leave the completion of conquest of France to them.

"It was in order to concentrate himself the execution of the plan that the Commander in Chief in Russian Poland would begin in which he was confidently demonstrator, both from economic and military arguments, that the war of the future would be a short one, because based on a radical hypothesis.

Does Not Abandon Berlin.

The first decisive battle of the war is probably the one which is now unfolding in Poland. We shall see how the beautiful theories of peace work out, which were to abandon the capital, if necessary, to the enemy of the east in order to crush the enemy of the west in a maximum time. Do not forget that the first sudden attack by Russians East Prussia provoked a stream of German transports from the west to the east.

The second axis of German strategy, namely, enveloping by wings, had as a direct consequence the invasion of Belgium. This is not the place to tell of the colossal political error of this enterprise. The seed of that will be reaped in Germany when the treaty of peace is signed.

Belgian Attack Aided France.

But to speak only of military affairs, it is not enough to say that Germany, in attacking Belgium, did a benevolent thing for France. That made England united on the question of an immediate expeditionary army, and the great extension of one of the German wings on the left bank of the Meuse lost every aspect of a surprise and a strategical surprise is one of the most precious elements of success. At all events, we have not seen a brilliant quick movement, nor has an unexpected one come from the fortified regions of Metz Thionville to the formidable Montmedy.

"All their beautiful strategy, of such formidable appearance, has ended, in that since the battle of the Marne, we have had to take the initiative in operations, and, as a matter of fact, the time has arrived when we attack the Germans at will. If neither of the two belligerents has been able to surround his adversary on account of the North Sea, it is nevertheless true that it is our line of battle which effected the enveloping movement from Nieuport to Belfort, with the result that for a month and a half the Germans have been reduced to a strategical defensive.

Calais Of No Use.

"Emperor William ordered the capture of Calais at any cost. If this desire of taking Calais at any cost is real we must see in it a desire to raise a bodiless scarecrow in the face of England. A German paper said recently: 'The English, fearing for the security of their island, have decided to send no more troops to the continent.' New fables.

"Suppose the Germans had the freedom of the sea for a few hours, thanks to a fog, it would still be a difficult problem to land an expeditionary force on British soil for the very good reason that already they are having a very hard time feeding their troops on the continent."

RUSSIA MAKING STRIDES.

Country of Vast Possibilities Lacks Sufficient Sea Coast.

The progress of Russia has been tremendous in the last decade, says a writer in the Popular Science Monthly. The years since the Japanese war have seen the adoption of a constitutional regime, the rapid spread of industrialism, the greatest agrarian reforms since emancipation, and a remarkably intelligent study and handling of the problems of primary education, agriculture and intemperance.

Along with this has come a clear appreciation of the richness of her resources. "In the markets of the world there exists to-day a famine in meat, lumber and breadstuffs," say the Russian economists, "and Russia has, or can develop, all three to an indefinite amount. Russia has a geographic basis for a great nation such as is possessed by no other people unless it be our own.

It is wanting, however, in one important respect; it lacks an adequate coast line. Russia's sea coast is too small for so large a state and she is bound to demand more. Indeed, that is what she has been doing for centuries, her eastward movement has been in progress for at least four hundred years and we are witnessing to-day of another gigantic step in this direction. The Germans block the way, and ultimately, combined with them, the Swedes and Danes.

That Russia with her population of 170,000,000, increasing at the rate of nearly three millions a year, and with resources so vast and undeveloped that they can only be roughly estimated, will be kept permanently bottled up is not likely. Her eastward advance, however, will follow lines of least resistance and the conquest of an outlet by way of Constantinople to the world's trade is as inevitable as is its geographical reasonableness. Toward the Persian Gulf the way is also open and inviting. Indeed, everywhere in Asia she has the unique advantage of internal lines of development and the reflex action of strategic Gibraltar with the serious menace to British world supremacy she now is in Germany, but in Russia.

KING HAS PRIVATE WAR NEWS

Gets Confidential Despatches of War Office and Admiralty.

When King George visited a military hospital on a recent occasion the wounded with whom he chatted were astonished at his Majesty's extensive and accurate knowledge of the officers under whom they had served, and also the information he possessed of the movements of the troops on the Continent. As a matter of fact, King George and Lord Kitchener undoubtedly know more concerning the activities of the British troops than any men in England. Sir John French's private despatches to Lord Kitchener are shared by King George. Almost every day the newspapers report that the Secretary of State for War has visited the King, and it is during these consultations that the vital facts concerning the troops are laid before his Majesty.

Of course, not the slightest rumor of what has occurred at these meetings ever leaks out. Directly the King has left his private apartments a secretary enters and destroys the contents of the waste-paper basket or any odd scrap of paper which might afford a clue as to what took place during the interview. These precautions are taken before any servant is allowed to enter the room. Important military despatches King George keeps locked in his safe and desk, of which there are but single keys, which his Majesty carries with him.

It was a wounded soldier who said that "King George carried the army list in his head," but the enthusiastic "Tommy" in question would probably be more surprised if he knew the full extent of his Majesty's knowledge of military and naval affairs. During his many years in the navy the King had ample opportunity of studying British and foreign coast defences. He knows every weak and strong spot on the North Sea and Channel coast, and of recent years he has especially concerned himself with the growth of English coast defences. King George has also obtained extensive practical knowledge of naval tactics by taking an active part in all the big naval reviews.

Dancing in Germany.

Dancing at the German court is always a matter to be taken seriously. The kaiser himself is an expert dancer, and will have only experts at the state balls. At all these functions the court dancing master occupies a place of vantage from which he can watch the dancers and any mistakes or clumsiness will be certain to bring the delinquent a polite intimation that he must mend his steps or expect no further invitations.

It is sometimes almost as hard to meet a bill as it is to keep out of its way.

RETALIATION BY CONVICTS

THE VENGEANCE VOW AND ITS CONSUMMATION.

Telling a Few Instances Where Nothing Seriously Resulted.

Some convicted prisoners take their sentences philosophically enough; others rage for a bit, and the quiet down. Others burn with the lust for revenge of the real, red sort; and it seems to give them some kind of ghoulish satisfaction—it alleviates their thirst for blood—if they can, with mighty oaths, declare what they're going to do when the day of freedom comes, writes a prison chaplain in London Answers.

On Murder Bent.

I remember one man saying to me, with vicious fierceness and an evil light in his eyes: "You wait, parson, till I get out of this. Give me twenty four hours, and I'll hash the life out of him! The scoundrel!" And he grits his teeth.

You check him, or try to; but it's useless. He'll admit the truth of what you say, but, "What and you'll see!" "See you back here!" you complete, with significance. "I don't care! I'll wring for him!" Well, there you have to leave it. You've done your best. Convict life is going to do his worst, and you can't stop him.

He served his time and went out. Also, he came back. What happened? R. pure chance I was in the assistant's. He went back to his old, reported himself, and made it his aim to seek the man he intended to murder. He made the round of several public houses and, sure enough, he met the man he was looking for exactly.

The meeting was not, however, exactly as he had supposed it would be. Instead of the man being cowed and aggrieved at the exposure of his former treachery, he was in a state of high fierce defiance.

It was a night for more words than one. "I'll be even with you again, by——!" he cried. "I'm glad to see you. When did you come out? I owe you another shake."

The Silent Man.

No, no "shakes," drinks, and starts revolving a warder. The two stayed until closing time, talking and drinking, and getting more and more brotherly. They went out together, and——

Then it was that the unsuspicious pal was suddenly attacked. Then it was that the long meditated revenge was consummated. No. The two walked to the outskirts of the town, and proceeded to "crack a crib." They were caught red-handed and full-pocketed, and, after the sessions, my revengeful friend reappeared with the balance of his old sentence to serve, and a new one after that. And when in due course I greeted him, he was full of fierce threats against the gentleman whose life he had desired before.

In the circumstances I dispensed with a rebuke. A lurid revenge which evaporates so quickly is not worth tilting against.

A convict who says but little, but who can carry for three years that stern look in his eyes which shows that he is keeping a purpose ever in his mind, is much more dangerous. That sort of man acts.

One told me, quietly and with no melodramatic boasting, exactly what he intended to do to a certain man who had "let him in." I am bound to say that it seemed a bad case of rank disloyalty and treachery.

His Long, Long Journey.

On his release he asked for his railway-ticket to the town where the man lived, went to the house, with a hammer in his pocket, and asked for him. A white-faced woman, with two frightened children clinging to her skirts, opened the door. "Where was her husband?" She burst into tears. "Doing seven years." Been sentenced but two months before.

The ex-convict chortled with fiendish delight, mingled with regret that the hammer could not be used! No. He had money, and he kept that family for the next five years.

That's real life! Put it on the stage, or in a book, and it wouldn't be believed. Against human nature? Ah, but there's a lot of evil and good in human nature.

Another convict; the usual threats, but not the usual result.

"I hope," I said, "you put that business about G—— out of your mind."

He smiled with sinister satisfaction.

"He's gone to sea, parson." I said I was glad. He smiled again. "A wet journey, parson, and no return till Judgment Day!"

I looked at him queerly, but he said "Good-day!" and went.

Every cloud has a silver lining; but that is small consolation when you cannot see through the cloud.

NERVOUS CHILDREN

The Trouble is Often Really St. Vitus Dance—Do Not Neglect It

Many a child has been called awkward, has been punished in school for not keeping still or for dropping things, when the trouble was really St. Vitus dance. This disease may appear at any age, but is most common between the ages of six and fourteen years. It is caused by thin blood which fails to carry sufficient nourishment to the nerves, and the child becomes restless and twitching of the muscles and jerking of the limbs and body follow. In severe cases the child is unable to hold anything or feed itself. St. Vitus dance is cured by building up the blood. The most successful treatment is to remove the child from all mental excitement, stop school work and give Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. These Pills renew the blood supply, strengthen the nerves, and restore the child to perfect health. Here is proof of their power to cure. Mrs. Geo. A. MacDonald, Harrington, N. S., says: "My son was attacked by St. Vitus dance; at the outset his muscles would twitch and his step was weak and jerky. We called in a doctor who treated him, but notwithstanding we continued to grow worse and at last grew so bad that he could not hold a cup in his hand, while his head constantly twitched, and his speech became rather indistinct. At this juncture I saw in a paper the cure of a boy from similar trouble through the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. We at once sent for a supply, and in a few weeks after he began their use there was considerable improvement, and it was not long after this before he was completely cured, and has never had a symptom of the trouble since. I am convinced that there is no medicine like Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for the cure of St. Vitus dance.

If your dealer does not keep Dr. Williams' Pink Pills you can get them by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 by writing the Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

LAUDS BANTAM SOLDIER.

British Medical Journal Praises His Trench Work.

That little men have many advantages in war time over their bigger brothers is an argument advanced in the British Medical Journal.

After expressing the view that 80,000 have been lost to the army in the last few weeks owing to the present height standard, the journal says:—

"Not a little is to be said in favor of short infantry. Short men occupy less room in transport. They find cover more easily and offer a smaller mark to the bullets and shrapnel. They are better sheltered in trenches and require to dig trenches less deep to protect themselves.

"It takes less khaki to clothes them and less leather to boot them. The army blanket covers them more amply, and they need less food than tall, thin men to keep up their body heat and maintain their marching energy.

"Those who stand the rigors of cold climates are not always big men, and the sailor, like the windswept tree on the coast, may be a short man. Warmth and easy conditions of life rather tend to the development of tall men.

"The cavalry and artillerymen require to be big and powerful, but as to those who burrow in the trenches, how can it matter whether they are 4 feet 9 or 5 feet 6? We are not out for a show and a parade, but to win a war of sieges and attrition."

A DIVORCE GRANTED

After many years of patient suffering you can be divorced from corns by applying Putnam's Corn Extractor, which acts in 24 hours without pain. Refuse a substitute because "Putnam's" is the remedy that is safe and painless. 25c per bottle at all dealers.

Unbusinesslike.

"Husband, can you pay me back that dollar you borrowed from me?"

"But, my dear," he protested. "I have already paid it back twice. Surely you don't expect it again."

A born diplomat is one who can hide his ignorance behind a smile.

Little Dorothy had received for a present a teddy bear which happened to be afflicted with a "cross-eye." A visitor arriving soon after Dorothy had received the teddy bear asked the child what she intended to call it. "Gladly," said Dorothy. "Gladly! What a peculiar name," exclaimed she visitor. "However did you think of that for a name?" "Gladly the cross bear," recited Dorothy, who goes to Sunday School.

The sailor had been showing the gaudy visitor over the ship. In thanking him she said, "I see that by the rules of your ship tips are forbidden." "Lord bless yer 'eart, ma'am," replied Jack, 'so were the apples in the Garden of Eden."

NATIVE TROOPS OF INDIA

TIRELESS WARRIORS PROVE THEIR LOYALTY.

The Ghoorka In An Ever-Ready Bundle of Nerves and Eager Aggressiveness.

"Sahib, the regiment is my father and mother, but in this matter my honor is concerned, and if I do not get the leave I ask I will desert; the night will find me there," said the East Indian soldier, pointing into the distance when his officer expressed unwillingness to grant the desired furlough. The trooper was a Pathan whose service record was a splendid one, and at last the leave he craved was reluctantly allowed him.

The officer had consented rather than force the Indian into insubordination. True to his promise, the soldier returned to the post on the very hour. Then it was that his commander questioned him about the reason for the leave which had been asked for well nigh with a threat. The reply was:

"Well, Sahib, the matter was thus: My brother was killed by one of another clan, and on me, as his nearest of kin, the feud developed. Had I failed in my duty shame would have been on me, but by the pleasure of Allah that is not so. Our enemy's village now mourns one of its best and bravest."

Such are the Pathans,

who constitute a very considerable element of England's native troops in India, although the general public has heard less of them than of some of the others.

Once interested in his soldier work under British leadership the Pathan is intensely loyal, a fighting man that can be counted upon to do battle with all his strength and to the last drop of his blood in the cause of his adoption. Indeed he loves the intoxication of strife, and he is a foe to be reckoned with until either dead or physically unable to deal a blow.

Somehow in stories of India, the writer of fiction likes to bring in the picturesque Sikh, and for this reason many people have been led to the conclusion that the Indian native army is composed mostly of this race. That is not really the case, but it is a fact that the Sikh is a fighting man of proved quality, and upon more than one battlefield he has won renown and shown amazing dauntlessness in the face of desperate odds.

Before British annexation the Sikhs held and ruled the Punjab, and being born soldiers they presented a very difficult problem to their alien masters until their admiration was won by the battling superiority of the British, and then they were ready to cast their lot with their quondam foes.

Ghoorkas Sociable.

While the sikhs and the Dogras and the Pathans give a strikingly ornamental character to the Indian army, Tommy Atkins will tell you that his preference is for the little Ghoorkas, those grim, but humorous soldiers of the Crown who have won many laurels in their native land in the last eighty-odd years. Somehow the smile comes more naturally to the Ghoorka than the frown, but don't mistake his cheerfulness for a sign of subserviency or lack of courage. The Ghoorka is one nervous, ever ready bundle of aggressiveness. It would be hard to imagine more fighting spirit to the ounce that has been crowded into the muscular bodies of these born warriors.

They are a sturdy lot, hardened by hill climbing in the land of their birth, Nepaul, the mountain kingdom resting on the southern slope of the Himalayas at the north-east corner of India. They are fortunately not hampered by caste prejudices and will sit down in camp with white troops and eat and drink with them without ceremony.

There was the time when the Ghoorkas were Great Britain's Preliest and most troublesome foe. A hundred years ago the English had the Ghoorkas war on their hands, and for two years the military authorities had a troublesome problem to deal with. The conflict grew out of encroachments on British territory by these aggressive hillmen.

Like Close Fighting.

In the early stages of the war the Ghoorkas not only held the English troops in check but defeated them decisively upon a number of occasions. Following one of these fights, several of the Ghoorkas wandered into the British camp without guns and asked to have their wounds dressed, saying that they thought the English doctors would be able to make them quickly fit for the next fight.

In the end these battling children of the soil were beaten and cornered, and after that they became lasting friends and allies of the English. It is said that since then, now ninety-eight years, "no battle or expedition of importance has been without its battalions of green-coated little rifle-men with their deadly kukris in their belts."

The native soldier makes an excellent marksman and among the Indian contingent there are a great many first-class sharpshooters. But long range fighting is not quite to their liking; they love the intoxication of a hand-to-hand struggle, and their work with the bayonet and the knife is enough to chill the blood of any but the most courageous of antagonists. A bayonet in their hands becomes a doubly dangerous weapon, and in close fighting they excel.

Joints Quit Aching
Nerviline Drives Soreness Away

NO MORE STIFFNESS, PAIN OR MISERY IN YOUR BACK OR SIDE OR LIMBS!

Wonderful "Nerviline" is the Remedy.

A marvelous pain reliever.

Not an ordinary liniment — just about five times more powerful, more penetrating, more pain-subduing than any thick, oily or ammonia liniment. Nerviline fairly eats up the pain and stiffness in chronic rheumatic joints, gives quick relief to those throbbing pains, and never burns or even stains the skin.

"Rheumatism kept my joints swollen and sore for ten years. My right knee joint was often too painful to allow me to walk. In this crippled-to-me condition I found Nerviline a blessing. Its warm, soothing action brought relief I had given up hoping for. I rubbed on quantities of Nerviline and improved steadily. I also took Ferrozone at mealtime in order to purify and enrich my blood. I am to-day well and can recommend my treatment most conscientiously.

(Signed) C. PARKE.

Prince Albert.

Not an ache or pain in the muscles or joints that Nerviline won't cure. It's wonderful for lumbago and sciatica; for neuralgia, stiff neck, earache and toothache. Nerviline is simply a wonder. Best family liniment known and largely used for the past forty years. Sold by dealers everywhere, large family size bottle 50c., small trial size 25c. Refuse a substitute, take only "Nerviline."

BRITISH SOLDIER'S GRIT.

Italian Paper Pays Them Great Tribute.

The Giornale d'Italia publishes an article entitled "British soldiers keep smiling," by Signor Diego Angeli, one of the best known translators of Shakespeare. The author says that the whole psychology of the British soldier is summed up in the exclamation of the father who, his sons having died fighting, simply said, "They died like gentlemen."

Signor Angeli especially emphasizes the cleanliness of Britishers, which, he says, is but a reflection of their moral cleanliness, made up of simplicity and loyalty, qualities which are powerful factors making for courage and victory. The repulse of the Germans from the gates of Paris was due to these soldiers, who opened the attack and compelled the Prussians to retreat, so that "Field-Marshal French's contemptible little army" avenged themselves by sweeping the Kaiser's generals from the field. Signor Angeli gives several anecdotes to show the calmness in danger and coolness in daring of the British.

The writer concludes by relating that one day a whole regiment shouted to their comrades in some distant trenches: "Are we downhearted!" A pause ensued, then a bloody spectre raised himself from a trench, shouted "No!" with his last breath, and fell back dead. "English heroism is summed up in this incident," says Signor Angeli.

STICK TO IT

Until Tea or Coffee Hits You Hard.

It is about as well to advise people to stick to tea and coffee until they get hit hard enough so that they will never forget their experience.

A woman writes, and her letter is condensed to give the facts in a short space:

"I was a coffee slave, and stuck to it like a toper to his 'cups,' notwithstanding I frequently had severe attacks of sick headache; then I used more coffee to relieve the headache, and this was well enough until the coffee effect wore off. (The effects on the system of tea and coffee drinking are very similar, because they each contain the drug, caffeine.)

"Finally attacks of rheumatism began to appear, and ultimately the whole nervous system began to break down and I was fast becoming a wreck.

"After a time I was induced to quit coffee and take up Postum. This was half a year ago. The result has been most satisfactory.

"The rheumatism is gone entirely, nerves practically well and steady, digestion almost perfect, never have any more sick headaches, and am gaining steadily in weight and strength."

Name given by Canadian Postum Co., Windsor, Ont. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum — must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

SKILL WITH BAYONET ACQUIRED BY TOMMY.

Always Has Been Important Part of the British Soldier's Instruction.

"They can't stand the bayonet." That has been said of the Germans after every engagement.

In their credit it may be added that they face the most withering rifle fire and machine gun fire, but when Tommy and his French comrades get the order to charge with fixed bayonets the German soldiers break and flee, says a writer in The New York Press.

Despite the great increase both in range and deadliness of guns and rifles, the bayonet is still the final factor in deciding a big battle. British army authorities have always recognized that, and instruction in how to use the bayonet has always been an important part of the training of English soldiers.

So important is bayonet fighting regarded, in fact, that British soldiers are taught it practically individually instead of in numbers, as in other parts of their training. Each bayonet instructor, in fact, only trains four pupils at a time, so that he can clearly see and point out the weakness of each man.

When the "Tommy" begins to learn the various parries against an imaginary foe, dummy rifles with ordinary bayonets are used; but when he "takes on" his instructor a spring bayonet is fixed to his rifle. These bayonets have broad buttons on the end of them, and recoil at once when they hit. The instructor and his pupil are, of course, well protected with masks, padded jackets and gloves in case of accidents.

Fights Padded Jacket.

"Tommy's" first foe is a padded jacket hung on a wall, and the movement learned from it is officially known as the "Engage" or "On guard." This position is one in which the soldier is ready for any emergency, to thrust or parry, to jump forward or back. It is, too, he is taught always to keep his bayonet directed at the chest of his foe.

With this first instruction "Tommy" is also taught another absolutely vital point in bayonet fighting. That is, that his whole safety depends on keeping his opponent outside his bayonet point, for once the enemy gets "inside" the bayonet the soldier is more or less helpless.

In bayonet fighting, in fact, the whole of the rifle is kept in front of the body, and the soldier never draws his rifle back before making a thrust.

These points are emphasized in the training, the rifle being "thrown out" to the full extent of the arm, the feet not being moved from the "engage" position.

The next step is training to avoid or parry this "throw point," as it is called. It is usually made at a man's chest, and is parried from the "engage" position by moving the rifle to the right or left, thus pushing the attacker's bayonet away to one side or the other. When the thrust is turned down, the bayonet being slightly imbedded in the ground.

The Best Attack.

By far the most effective form of attack is that of the "low point," as it is called. To deliver this attack the soldier drops down on his left hand, or on his left knee, and delivers the "throw point" in an upward direction. This attack is parried in the same way as the "throw point."

In addition to learning the above ways of attack and defence, the soldier is also taught the "beat," that is to say, the way of knocking down an enemy's guard, by giving his rifle a smart hit with his own weapon.

It requires considerable practice, however, to train recruits to use the bayonet quickly, and quickness is taught by a machine.

A square frame of wood about 10 feet high has running down its center a wire on which are threaded a number of balls of thickly woven straw. A mechanical device releases these straw balls in succession from the top of the wire, and as they pass the recruit has to stab each one with a quick movement, withdrawing the bayonet in time to stab the one following closely behind.

The advantage of this machine is that it not only teaches the soldier quick and accurate bayonet work, but it develops the wrist muscles necessary to withdraw the bayonet after it has completed its deadly work.

Halifax Sends Out a Message of Help to Many People.

Halifax, N.S., Dec. 15—When interviewed at her home at 134 Argyle St., Mrs. Haverstock was quite willing to talk of her peculiarly unfortunate case. "I was always 'blue' and depressed, felt weak, languid and utterly unfit for any work. My stomach was so disordered that I had no appetite. What I did eat disagreed. I suffered greatly from dizziness and sick headache and feared a nervous breakdown. Upon my druggist's recommendation I used Dr. Hamilton's Pills.

"I felt better at once. Every day I improved. In six weeks I was a well woman, cured completely after different physicians had failed to help me. It is for this reason that I strongly urge sufferers with stomach or digestive troubles to use Dr. Hamilton's Pills."

Dr. Hamilton's Pills strengthen the stomach, improve digestion, strengthen the nerves and restore debilitated systems to health. By cleansing the blood of long-standing impurities, by bringing the system to a high point of vigor, they effectually chase away weariness, depression and disease. Good for young or old, for men, for women, for children. All dealers sell Dr. Hamilton's Pills of Mandrake and Butternut.

Schoolboys as Firemen.

The timely discovery of a fire in the roof of the Harrow Science Hall at Shrewsbury School, England, averted a serious conflagration. Flames broke out near the flue adjoining a store of chemicals. The headmaster, his staff, and scholars kept the fire under control until the arrival of the fire brigade, and although the roof of the building had to be partially dismantled the damage was comparatively small. The boys considered it great fun and rejoiced that they would not be compelled to "make stinks" until the hall is repaired.

WILLOW CREEK

A large number of friends and neighbors gathered at the home of Mr and Mrs Geo Kidd on Tuesday evening, Jan. 5th and spent a very enjoyable evening. The object of the gathering was a presentation before they left for their new home in Glamis. Councillor Geo Baker occupied the chair and kept the crowd in good humor. A very interesting programme was tendered. Speeches were given by Messrs T Wrightsou, J W Hyde, J Metcalf and P Leddicott. Songs by the U. B. church choir, recitations by the Misses B. H. and M. Stanley, auto harp selections by Mr H Wrightson and violin selections by Messrs S Vance and P Leddicott, after which the following address was read by Mr Chris Airey, Mr J Metcalf and Mrs T Wrightson making the presentation:

To Mr and Mrs Geo Kidd:

DEAR FRIENDS—We your friends and neighbors have gathered here this evening to mark the occasion of your leaving our neighborhood, and to show the respect in which you have been held in our community by one and all. You have been in our midst for over forty years and in that time have gathered a large circle of friends. You have been faithful workers in our church and in times of need have been ever ready to lend him a helping hand, and as friends and neighbors we deeply regret your loss. We ask you to accept this lounge, walking cane and silver sugar spoon, not for their intrinsic value but as a slight token of our esteem and good will towards you. Our good wishes go with you to your future home. Signed by T Wrightson and J Metcalfe.

Mr and Mrs Kidd both made suitable replies. Lunch was after wards served and the inner man freely regaled. Before the party broke up the National Anthem was sung and everyone left with the fact deeply rooted in their mind that they had a very enjoyable evening.

UNDERWOOD

Miss Schwartz, of Buffalo, N.Y., is visiting her cousin, Mrs Tom Brown.

We regret to report the death of Mrs Charles M Berndt from pneumonia the sad event occurring at the the home of her son-in-law, Mr Wm Giesz, 2nd Bruce, on Friday, Jan 8th. The funeral was held on Monday afternoon to the German cemetery on the 4th from Mr Giesz's residence, Rev. Gischler, of Port Elgin, conducting the services. We extend our sympathy to the bereaved relatives and friends.

CARGILL

The patriotic concert held here on Jan 8th was a big success. The play was very good and a large crowd attended. The proceeds amounted to $115.

Mrs McFiggan, of Elmira, N Y, is visiting her sister, Mrs Andrew Bell here.

We had skating on the skating rink on Saturday night for the first time. The ice was pretty good.

Mr Joseph Clancy made a business trip to Toronto on Saturday.

LOVAT

Miss Julia McLean is spending holidays at her home here.

Mr. Howard McKeeman returned home, after spending a couple of weeks visiting friends in Toronto.

Mr Brownscombe, of the brick and tile yard, is busy getting in a supply of wood for the coming summer.

Mr John Pace, of the 8th con, spent the week-end with his cousin on the 4th of Elderslie.

Mr and Mrs John McKay and family have moved to their new home in Paisley. We are sorry to lose them from our midst. Their house here will still be occupied by Mr and Mrs J G McKay.

A number of the farmers around this burg intend getting a sawing machine to cut their winter's supply of wood.

Miss Allie Lemont returned home from Walkerton, after spending holidays with her friends there.

CANTIRE

The roads after the New Year's snow storm last week are so high as to be almost impassible with a team. The Tp. snow plow made its initial trip down Eg fourth street from end to end and the result was a big top road. We have heard croakers at municipal meeting get worthy at the council's extravagance in buying such useless implements, but those who viewed its work the other day are inclined to think the township daddies made a good investment.

Miss Edna Pringle, of Shallow Lake, is staying with her friend Miss Sara Eason.

Cantire Sunday School held its annual meeting on Tuesday evening last. The officers and teachers were re-elected. Of secretary's report showed an average attendance of forty. After providing quarterlies for the winter months to be used as home study a balance of $1.00 still on hand was voted to the Belgian relief fund. Owing to the prevalence of jaundice in this section the annual Xmas tree was dispensed with. Children perhaps were disappointed, but wait till the big picnic comes off next summer which the teachers hope to have more to say about later on.

The Somerville family have moved to their new home on the old Greaves farm, lot 5. We welcome this estimable family to our community.

Mr John Teasdale whose home is near Moose Jaw, Sask., was looking up his fourth con. friends last week. John is a steady young who has acquired a half section of good land and is well satisfied with his lot in life only he is still batching.

CARGILL

A most enjoyable entertainment was given in the Forester's hall at Cargill on Friday evening last in aid of the Belgian fund. The first part of the programme was a comedy-in one act, "War Times," excellently presented by a caste of local amateurs, this was followed by readings cleverly and vividly depicting scenes from the late battle of the Meuse. The camp scene which was next on the programme was a very effective tableau by the side of a fire and surrounded by clusters of trees were blvoucked representatives of the defence of our country softly humming songs of home and their loved ones far away while in the background a British entry paced back and forth, his bayonet glowing red in the light of the camp fire. The chorus of the British marines presented arms with admirable precision, when the Union Jack was waved across the foreground of the scene. "Rule Britannia" followed by songs of the royal navy were rendered with a spirit worthy of real Jack Tars. Against a background of the grouped flags of the allies the "National anthem" was sung by uniformed representatives of each, the "British Anthem" last of all, and the evening ended with three hearty cheers for the king. A capacity audience greeted the performers. The handsome sum of $160 was realized besides the donation of $15 by Mr and Mrs Gilbert Hettrick. The management wishes to thank most heartily everyone who co-operated with them in their efforts to make the evening a success.

TARA

The contest in Tara was one of the hottest municipal elections we have had for many years. Reeve Dolphin had the position of reeve for only one year, and it is as a good deal to enter into a contest and defeat a man who has only had a one year term. Mr Dolphin had a strong argument in this and he used it to advantage. But Mr Dolphin has himself to blame for not having the seat by acclamation this year. He was elected last year with a majority of nearly fifty through sympathy at having been defeated on many previous occasions. He brought defeat this year on himself. Mr Grant has proved that he can come back and that the people have trust and confidence in him. He has also vindicated himself of the many untrue and unfounded slanderous stories circulated about his connection with the Tara Hotel Co and the purchase of the British hotel property. He has a right to feel elated at the expression of genuine confidence and goodwill as given at the poll on Monday.—Leader.

EDEN GROVE

Miss B Lovell, our teacher, slipped on the sidewalk and had the misfortune to sprain her ankle, and was unable to teach school for a few days.

Messrs Jos Taylor and B Stansel were in the county town on business this week.

The beer man's team took fright at the train the other day, and in its flight ran into the verandah in front of J Beller's wagon shop and lowered it to the ground. The team was caught and no further harm was done.

The Rawleigh man is out these fine days up in Bruce, and reports good business.

WALKERTON

Mr William Findlayson of Walkerton has received word that four of his nephews who were fighting in a Scottish regiment at the front, had been killed outright on the battlefield. Many families in Scotland are being almost decimated by the war, as the flower of Old Scotia is about all out on the thin red line battling for the cause of freedom and the integrity of the empire.

George Haines of Greenock, who like many in Walkerton and Brant, had been losing chickens for some time, became tired of the depredations on his feathered flock and suspecting certain parties placed Constable J H Armstrong on the trail of the culprits. Taking up the scent like a veritable Sherlock Holmes the knight of the baton soon had four young men under arrest, two of whom were sons of a prominent Justice of the Peace. On being taken before Mr James Johnston, J.P., at Kinlough they were all fined handsomely for the affair.

The Walkerton boys, who are guarding the wireless station at Tobermory, are kept well-posted on happenings at the front, they catching the happenings as they are flashed across the country from Halifax, and they consequently get next to the doings long before they appear in the daily papers. They also intercept much German news that is sent by wireless to Sayville, N.Y., and so get the German version of the fight before it is served up by the press of the American republic. So, although in a lonely part of the country, the boys are kept wheel-up on the latest happenings in the war zone.

Although the Ontario Railway and Municipal Board released Brant Township from receiving the bridge near Archie McCurdy's farm and which had recently been destroyed by floods, McCurdy entered an action against Brant for $1000 for the depreciation of his farm which he claimed had dropped that amount in value through the loss of the bridge. His neighbor, Mr John Butchart, also claimed that his 35 acres had depreciated about $15 an acre, or $525 in all. The township therefore found itself confronted with a total claim of $1525. As a consequence, the Brant council and their solicitor, Mr O E Klein, met the claimants and their solicitor, Mr D Robertson, in Walkerton on Saturday last and threshed the matter out. After both sides had groan freely with argument, the contending forces came to a settlement by the Township paying McCurdy and Butchart $525 in full of of all claims. Thus has this old ordinance been taken off the stage.—Herald and Times.

MITCHELL, Hyde's old stand.

—No person needs to be informed of the money stringency that prevails throughout the world at the present time. This is not only felt by the large manufacturers but by the smaller as well. We are a small manufacturer of bread. I notice by a trade journal that in the state of Michigan over 300 bakers have gone to the wall since the war broke out. In view of this fact—with the high mark that flour has reached, and likely to go higher, and the millers demanding cash for their flour—I am compelled to ask all parties owing me on account to kindly pay me at once. Having a certain of flour being unloaded I must have money to meet the draft. P. S. MCLACHLAN.

PUTNAM & SON

—If the 150 men wanted from Bruce county for the third contingent only 64 have so far been secured, and enlistment will be continued until further notice. Capt. Klein is in charge of the muster at Walkerton, and Dr. Houston of Paisley is medical examiner.

—Bruce county members of the second contingent at London training camp are making a record as marksmen. The company to which they were attached won the "Ascertines" cup, which was competed for by the whole 18th Battalion. At a banquet held to celebrate the victory Corporals Tooke, Scott and Traynor were presented with jack-knives for making especially good showing in the shooting.

—The School Board met on Wednesday evening to finish up 1914 business, after which the new board held the first statutory meeting for 1915, all members being in their places except D. McKenzie. By unanimous vote Dr Houston was chosen as chairman for the year. The visiting committees are: First term of four months, Rev. L. W. Piehl and J. R. Laidlaw; second term, Dr. Black and J. B. McBride; third term, Dr. Houston and D. McKenzie.

—A quiet but pretty wedding was solemnized in Crawford St. Methodist church, Toronto, on Wednesday, Jan 20th, when Ida Lillian, daughter of Mr and Mrs Wm Walker of Paisley, became the wife of Edward Alexander Roberts, of Carlevale, Sask. The ceremony was performed by Rev Dr Smith. The young people are spending a few days in Hamilton and other points, and will be in Paisley for a short time before leaving for their home in the west.

—Stormy weather and strong counter attractions on Friday night last did not prevent the people of S.S. No. 7 Elderslie and 8 Saugeen, Elora Road north, from holding their entertainment and piling up another nice contribution for the Belgian Relief Fund. The proceeds amounted to $36.15, and another contribution of $1.50 was since added. A very entertaining programme was rendered, under the direction of Mr Wm Pearce as chairman, and the boxes were sold off by auctioneer Pearce.

—At the annual meeting of the public Library Board the following officers were elected for 1915: Chairman, G. L. Carter; Treasurer, Thos Muir; Secretary and Librarian, Miss McCallum. Other members of the Board are Messrs A. Jack, D. Forrester, P. S. Ballachey and I. Shoemaker. The treasurer's report showed the receipts for 1914 amounted to $348, and there is now a small balance on hand. According to the librarian's report there were 6732 volumes loaned to readers during the year, classified as follows: General work 289, geography and travels 262, history 224, literature 333, biography 107, musical and fine arts 47, natural science 274, religious 88, juvenile 989, fiction 3093, works of reference 45, magazines 800, juvenile 135. Number of books purchased during year 152, renewals 11, donations 58—total new books 181. Three daily newspapers, 4 weeklies and 14 magazines or periodicals are on the reading room tables. The number of reading members is 875, of whom 40 are non-residents.

—Mr. and Mrs. G. B. Irwin are in Toronto for a few days this week.

—It's only a dollar, but it means a good deal to THE ADVOCATE if hundreds are slow in paying that on their subscription.

—Our aged citizen, Mr Robt Hamilton, was stricken with paralysis a few days ago, and is confined to his bed. His speech was affected, but is now somewhat improved.

—The amount of collection taken in Paisley churches for relief of the Belgians on a recent Sunday was $174.80. Knox church $74.75, Methodist $43.25, Anglican $36.80, Baptist $20.

—The four clergymen of the town and their wives were entertained at the home of Reeve Ballachey on Monday evening, and spent a most enjoyable time under that very hospitable roof.

—The Women's Patriotic League will hold a quilting bee in Putnam's hall on Tuesday afternoon, Feb. 2nd. On Tuesday and Wednesday afternoon clothing for the Belgians will be received at the same place and packed.

—Master Irvine Gage, of the Junior IV class of the public school, is to be congratulated on the success of his composition in the recent contest of the League of the Empire. The contest was open to pupils of Ontario from 12 to 16 years of age, and Irvine in his essay on "The Capture of Quebec" came next to the one who received the medal, thus receiving honorary mention. As Irvine is just 12 years old this promises well for his career in composition. Congratulations, Irvine.

—The annual meeting of Knox church congregation, held on Thursday evening, was fairly well attended for a stormy night. Encouraging reports were read from the various organizations of the congregation. The total financial receipts of 1914 amounted to $3,888.16, of which the chief items were—for revenue $1400.53, missions $919.52. The total expenditure was $3,357.95. There is a floating debt on current expense account, and it was decided at the meeting to make an effort to wipe this out. Subscription lists were opened at the meeting and a canvass will be made to raise the whole amount required. The cost of placing partitions in the basement was reported to be $125.75. The Sunday School receipts were $140.94 and the Women's Missionary organization reports show $120.87 raised under name of W.F.M.S., and $111.29 under name of W.M.S., the former having been merged into the latter during the year. The aggregate receipts from all departments amounts to $3,173.34 for the year. The membership of the congregation is 327. Messrs J B McArthur, J Sheepy, Dan McGillivray and Alex Thornburn were re-elected to the Board of Managers, while John Brown was re-elected chairman, J B McArthur secretary and J C Gibson treasurer; auditors—D. Forrester and D McKenzie; ushers—Jas Milne, John Hamilton, Jr., Wm McBride and D D Campbell. It was decided to hold a tea-meeting this year, the ladies to have full control of the arrangements. The chair was occupied by the pastor, Rev C C Little, B A.

—Mrs. And. Munro, of Sydney, B.C., is visiting friends in Bruce county for a part of the winter.

—Mr. and Mrs. Cox and family, of Red Deer, Alta., are visiting at the home of her father, Mr. Geo. Greer, 15th Bruce.

—Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Bates are down from Winnipeg on a two months' visit to their relatives and friends in Paisley and Tara.

—The large attendance at the annual meeting of the Paisley Agricultural Society manifests a live interest in the maintenance of the fall fair here. It will be remembered that the Horticultural Society directors, at the meeting in November, decided to wind up that organization and hand over the funds to the Agricultural Society. This has now been done, and the fair will hereafter be held under the auspices of the one body instead of two. The officers for 1915 are: President, H. McBeath; 1st Vice-Pres., J. T. Richardson; 2nd Vice-Pres., J. M. Hopper; Sec'y-Treas., W. R. Barnett; Directors—W Pearce, A Galbraith, Geo McKay, J H McBride, W T Stewart, John McDermid jr, Jas Lewis, R Fullerton, J McFadden, Jas Milne, W Megraw, J N Collins, R B Grant, John Brown, A L McKinnon, Geo Grant, W Grant, W T Hopper, Alex Jack, S Ballachey.

—People of this section have responded openhandedly to the call for funds to relieve distress among the Belgians. Over the whole of Canada and United States the same generous spirit has been displayed, and an immense amount of food and clothing has been despatched to the little kingdom. Still the supplies are not sufficient to meet more than a fraction of the needs to keep hundreds of thousands from starvation. It has been stated by one who is familiar with the conditions in Belgium that after January all food except meat must come from America. With peace and comparative plenty on this continent, and the martyr's part played by Belgium in the great European disturbance there should be no lack of benevolence being extended across the sea until such time as the sturdy Belgians are again in a position to provide for themselves.

Hints for the Home

Salad Suggestions.

Romain and Asparagus Salad.—Wash and drain tender romain leaves, place three canned asparagus in its hollow and pour a few teaspoonfuls of chiffonade or piquant dressing over.

Wax Bean Salad in Onion Rings.—Parboil the wax beans or use canned ones. Skin and slice large Spanish onions, then steam or boil carefully in flat dish. When tender drain and remove half of the centres of each slice. Place on plates or on salad platter. Dress the beans with French dressing or mayonnaise and pile in centre of each ring. This is nice with cold meats and French fried or sauted potatoes.

Potato and Onion Salad.—Pare and cut potatoes into thin slices, parboil until done but not mashed. Drain and pour on a shallow dish. Now take centres of the boiled onion rings from the wax bean salad, mash with a fork, add a sifting of salt and pepper, then mix with enough boiled dressing to make a smooth, rather thick emulsion. Sift salt and pepper over the potatoes, then cover with the dressing and let it stand for an hour to ripen. This is a nice luncheon dish and can be served with rings of hard boiled eggs, curled lettuce or boiled ham.

Flower Salad.—Separate, wash and drain a nice white cauliflower, drop into a kettle of rapidly-boiling water and cook until tender. Take up carefully and cool on a platter. For each helping have a blue, cup-shaped lettuce leaf. Place on many of the little sections, heaped up, as will form a pretty imitation of a flower, sift lightly with a little salt and pass a fancy dish of thick boiled cream dressing to pour over at the table.

Boiled Cream Dressing.—Ingredients: Two tablespoonfuls of flour, two tablespoonfuls of yellow mustard, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, one teaspoonful of salt, yolks of three eggs, one cup of milk, one tablespoonful of cider vinegar. Mix all dry ingredients, adding the well beaten yolks, and when smooth add milk gradually. Cook in double boiler until smooth and thickened. Add vinegar gradually and cook only until at boiling point. Remove from stove and beat with a revolving beater until partly cooled.

Red Wine Vinegar Dressing.—Ingredients: One teaspoonful of sugar, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one teaspoonful of onion juice, two tablespoonfuls of olive oil, four tablespoonfuls of red wine vinegar. Method: Rub first four ingredients together until smooth, then stir in the vinegar slowly, beating all the time.

Useful Hints.

Beans are the most nutritious of all vegetables.

Whiting and ammonia are best for cleaning nickel.

Every cellar should be aired and sunned often.

As a rule meats containing much fat are not wholesome.

Dates can be stuffed with cream cheese filled with nuts.

If you sprinkle salt on mushrooms before they are cooked it will bring out the juice.

Nice little rounded aprons may be cut from the good back of a man's worn out shirt.

To keep white paint bright, rub it with a clean kerosene cloth after the ordinary cleaning.

Sprinkle the top of the pie with cold water before baking: it will make the crust more flaky.

Water in which potatoes have been boiled is the best thing with which to sponge and revive a silk dress.

Remember apple jelly can be made at any time through the winter, and is particularly good in the children's school sandwiches.

Tongue for sandwich filling should be minced fine and rubbed to a paste with mashed boiled eggs, seasoned with vinegar and butter.

For milk that has become scorched the taste may be restored again by standing it in a pan of cold water to which a pinch of salt has been added.

The quickest way to stone raisins is to place the raisins on a tin in the oven until they are heated through, then split them open and the stones are easily removed.

When ironing circular centre-pieces or tablecloths see that the iron moves with the straight grain of the cloth, for it is in this way only that the edges will be perfectly flat.

To render pork sausages more digestible, thoroughly prick the sausages and plunge into boiling water for five minutes, after which they may be fried in the usual way.

Here is an excellent way to keep parsnips moist bright red clean looking: Fill a cheesecloth bag with flaxseed and soak it in water for a few hours. Then wipe the paint with it.

When darning stockings run a thread round each hole before beginning and draw until the edges lie flat. This makes the hole appear smaller, and it will be much easier to mend.

When washing scrubbing or hair brushes, if they are put to dry with the bristles downward they will last twice as long. If turned the other way the water soaks into the wood and rots the bristles.

The best way to warm up a roast of meat is to wrap it in thickly greased paper, and keep it covered while in the oven. By having it covered the steam will prevent the meat from becoming hard and dry, and it will become heated through in less time.

WAR vs. INVENTIVENESS.

A Frenchman Perfected a Process for Making Margarine.

While war is undeniably the greatest curse to civilization, it is not without some compensations. It acts as a decided stimulus to inventive effort, not necessarily in the interest of destruction, but of economics. One of the greatest boons of to-day, synthetic butter, or, as it is more commonly called, margarine, was directly attributable to war. Napoleon III., realizing the position of his numerous poorer subjects, and the fact that they could not afford to purchase butter, concluded that it would be better for them to consume a wholesome and nutritious substitute in preference to a dangerous and adulterated article. The outcome of this was the concentration of the efforts of Mege Mouries upon the solution of the problem, which culminated in the perfection of a process for the manufacture of margarine from animal fats. To-day is able to appreciate the significance and economic value of the illustrious Frenchman's discovery. Margarine is in favor throughout the world, and its production is one of the most prosperous industries. The manufacture has undergone extraordinary development, and has led to still further remarkable conquests of science, especially the superseding of animal fats by nut oils, which have been rendered tasteless and odorless. At the present time there are possibilities quite as golden as those in 1870. The man who succeeds in reducing the cost of manufacturing sugar, even by a cent per pound, will be appreciated by humanity at large. If he can evolve a practical and inexpensive means of manufacturing this commodity from the common root vegetables he will have achieved a greater success, while the discovery of a synthetic sugar which can be sold at half the price of the natural article will bring him a tremendous fortune and an imperishable record on the roll of fame. The discovery of a non-intoxicating beverage that may be sold profitably at one-half the price of the ordinary beers, and yet have the characteristic flavor of the latter, will also bring undying fame. Mercerized cotton has wrought a wide-spread revolution in the textile trade, and an equally striking effect will be produced by the man who perfects the means of producing a cheap artificial wool. The margarine of to-day is as dissimilar from that of 1870 as chalk is from cheese, a result due to the acquisition of concentration of energy, for which the achievement of Mege Mouries was directly responsible.

CLASS DISTINCTION.

What the War Has Done to Make Britain Democratic.

One certain result of the war will be a more democratic Britain. Constitutionally we have been subject to the will of the masses since 1832, but the class spirit has survived to an amazing degree, and this war is going to end it, writes Ella Hepworth Dixon.

An army in which everyone has volunteered, from colliers and shopmen to members of the Bachelors' and the Wellington, in which all these heterogeneous elements are fighting side by side and sharing good and evil alike—this army is not coming home against with quite the same ideas as when it started. The poor will assuredly lose some of their absurd prejudices about the rich; the rich will be more understanding about the difficulties and temptations of the populace. You cannot lie shoulder to shoulder with another man in a wet trench for days and nights on end, facing hourly death, without finding out his good points.

The classes and masses, Britain and India, the home country and the Dominions, are being brought together in the hour of trial as they have never been before. There is now but one Empire, and we should be able to forget our class distinctions as well as the divisions of color and race.

It is the same with the women at home. They have given of their best, and have shown a care and sympathy for the women of the lower classes which would not have been possible a few years ago, when charity and district-visiting were the only form of social service which we practiced.

It is not too much to say that in 1915 we shall find ourselves in a different world.

Two heads are better than one—in a kissing match.

CLIMATES CHANGED.

How Some Countries Have Altered Their Weather.

One of the difficulties in the path of new countries is that very often the climate is not just the sort needed for successful agriculture. But science is altering all that. Climates are being changed every year, gradually but surely.

The most common difficulty is usually too small a rainfall. Many countries have such severe droughts that if the tiny annual rainfall were just an inch or two less the soil would be impossible to cultivate, and the whole country would become a desert.

It is in cases like these that the climate-maker steps in. Where lack of rain is the trouble, he is usually the Government's botanical or forestry expert. His solution is to plant trees. For, strange as it may seem, trees increase the rainfall.

They do this in two ways. The leaves of trees are always—owing to their chemical make-up—cooler than the surrounding atmosphere, and so help to bring down what moisture there is in the air, much as a cold mountain top brings down rain. Then, too, the roots help to keep the moisture in the soil when the rain has actually fallen, instead of letting it be sucked up again by the hot sun.

The eucalyptus, or gum-tree, is the great weapon of the rain-maker; and it was recently announced that the Central Pacific Railway, which passes through a huge, flat desert east of the Rockies, has had gum-trees planted for hundreds of miles along the line to lessen droughts.

Malaria and mosquitoes are two other plagues in hot climates. The eucalyptus tackles them, too. The tannic acid in the roots drives malaria away. The mosquitoes just disappear.

The planting of trees—afforestation it is called—is done by the climate-maker for other purposes. Trees make a climate milder and shelter exposed regions. Spain has for centuries recklessly used up its great forests till it is now bare, with the result that its climate has become very extreme. Spain being nowadays scorchingly hot in the summer, like the Sahara, and very cold in the winter.

Drainage is another weapon of the man who makes climates. The draining of marshy ground not only adds great tracts to the agricultural wealth of the country, but raises the temperature of what is otherwise a moist and unhealthy region. The reason is that water or marsh does not heat up under sunshine as dry land does.

The object of a large scheme of drainage is as often to make the climate healthier as to benefit agriculture. Marshland means ague and malaria.

There are exceptions. The bogs of Ireland are quite healthful, owing to the amount of tannic acid they contain. So experiments are being made in different parts of the world as to the effect, on undrainable swamps, of injecting huge quantities of tannic acid.

But if Ireland's bogs were scientifically drained, that country would, according to an Australian climate adjuster, have summers five degrees hotter than she has now.

NAVAJOS FEAR THE DEAD.

Bodies are Got Rid of as Quickly as Possible.

A practice of the Navajo Indians that promotes health among them, however repugnant it may be to us, is their disposition of the dead, says the Christian Herald. In the presence of the living the Navajo is without fear, but his terror of the dead is abject and unreasoning. The dead are believed to be possessed only of malevolent feelings towards the survivors, with unlimited powers for working evil upon those who carelessly place themselves within the power of the spirits.

So when any one dies, the only anxiety of the surviving relatives is to get rid of the body as quickly as possible. If there are any white men living in the neighborhood no effort is made to induce them to perform the offices of undertaker. If not, the disposition of the body depends somewhat upon circumstances. If the hogan, the modern wigwam is built of wood, it is set on fire and burned with the body in it. If of stone, the body is usually taken outside, the entrance to the hogan closed up with stones or sticks, and a hole made in the wall opposite to permit the evil spirits to enter and depart, and to warn passers by that the structure belongs to the dead.

If the death occurred in a rocky country, the body will likely be thrust into some crevice and thrown into it. It may be left uncovered, to become the prey of wolves and coyotes, or sticks and stones may be cast over it. If the family lives in a sandy part of the reservation, with no convenient crevices or chasms nearby, the body will be laid upon the sand, a little earth and some stones thrown upon it, and a pile of brush laid over all.

"The sun is all very well," said the Irishman, "but the moon is worth two of it, for the moon affords light in the night time when we want it, whereas the sun is with us in the day time when we have no occasion for it."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL STUDY

INTERNATIONAL LESSON, JANUARY 31.

Verse 8. Let the man of God whom thou didst send come again unto us, and teach us.—Manoah is particularly concerned about the visit which his wife received from the angel of the Lord. He is a devout man. His faith is stirred. He has a real desire to learn more about the wonderful thing that is to happen. He does not doubt that a child will be born unto him and his wife who will take a prominent place in the history of his people, and he wants to know, long before the coming of the child, how he is to be taught and what particularly is to be done that he may properly fulfill the functions that are to be his. This desire of the future father to be thoroughly informed, so that when the time arrives he will be ready immediately to begin the training of the child, is a splendid instance of the importance which the Jewish father placed upon his duty to his children, and also upon the implicit faith the ancient Hebrews had in God, who is the creator of all human life.

10 And the woman made haste and ran and told her husband. The wife of Manoah did not desire to be alone when the angel spoke. She knew the concern of her husband and also the importance of the duty that would be laid upon her; hence she wanted Manoah to be present, so that he, too, could hear and would be able to help her in the days of preparation for the coming of the child and his proper nurture.

11 And he said unto him, Art thou the man that spakest unto the woman? Manoah wanted to be sure that it was the same visitor. He wanted to have the same message direct from him as his wife had received it.

12 Now let thy words come to pass: what shall be the ordering of the child, and how shall we do unto him? Manoah insisted that the whole story should be retold; the instruction should again be given with explicitness, so that he, too, would know what had been said in the first instance to his wife.

13 And the angel of Jehovah said unto Manoah, Of all that I said unto the woman let her beware. The former message is here assumed, and the warning given that all that the woman had heard in the first instance she should take heed to observe.

14 She may not eat of any thing that cometh of the vine, neither let her drink wine or strong drink, nor eat any unclean thing: These are the outstanding things that the angel had commanded and which he again emphasized particularly. These were not all of the things, however, which he had said to the wife. He adds again, therefore, all that I commanded her let her observe.

Samson was to be a Nazarite, as Samuel later was (see Sam. 1. 11). Nazaritism was the outcome of reaction against the disastrous influence which Canaanitish heathenism had exercised against the Hebrew religion. It was particularly a reaction against the worship and customs of Canaan. (See Num. 6). In later times the prophets looked upon the Nazarites as a class of men whom Jehovah especially raised up to keep alive in Israel the true religion of Jehovah. (See Amos 2. 11).

15 And Manoah said unto the angel of Jehovah, I pray thee, let us detain thee, that we may make ready a kid for thee. The Hebrew instinct of hospitality shows itself strongly in this passage, as in so many other similar passages in Old Testament history.

16. Though thou detain me, I will be remembered how Jacob wrestled with the angel, trying to hold him, and succeeded to the point of suffering personal injury. It would seem as though here again the angel of the Lord indicated that he might be detained by Manoah, but even though Manoah did press the prerogatives of the host to their limit and detain the guest, yet he would not eat of the bread which should be prepared.

If thou will make ready a burnt-offering, thou must offer it unto Jehovah. It would seem that a certain seal of authority was to be placed upon the words which the stranger had spoken by the words which he now spoke concerning the burnt-offering; which would indicate to Manoah that he had been entertaining a heavenly visitor.

We read in verse 20 that Manoah became fearful when he discovered that he had been in the presence of the angel of the Lord, and he said, with great trepidation to his wife, "We shall surely die because we have seen God." But the intuition of his wife led her to show more judgment, for she said, "If Jehovah were pleased to kill us, he would not have received a burnt offering and a meal offering at our hand, neither would he have showed us all these things, nor would at this time have told such things as these."

24. And the woman bare a son, and called his name Samson.—The Hebrew of "Samson" is Shimshon, which comes from the word "Shemesh," and means "the sun." This name given to Samson would indicate that he was of a sunny and happy disposition. All Hebrew names, as indicated in a former lesson, have appellative meanings. Jacob means "supplanter"; Benjamin means "the son of the right hand"; Jerubbaal (Gideon), "Baal contends." See also 1 Sam 25. 25, where the foolish husband of Abigail is named Nabal, which means "fool."

25 Mahaneh dan—Mahaneh means "camp." Mahaneh dan, therefore, means the camp of Dan. This camp was between Zorah and Eshtaol. These two places, Zorah and Eshtaol, were two of the towns of the tribe of Dan, and they were far from the sea.

THE CREUSOT WORKS.

Guns Turned Out Are Most Deadly in the World.

The guns used by the French army are turned out by the hundred at the famous Creusot works. The history of these works, as well known as those of Krupp in Germany or Armstrongs in England, says Pearson's Weekly, reads like a romance.

The first mention of Creusot, under the name of Villa de Crosot, occurs as early as 1250. It was then a simple farm. It is now a town of 30,000 inhabitants.

In the sixteenth century coal was discovered at Creusot, though it was not until 200 years later that a company was formed to mine it. Ironworks soon sprang up, and there and the manufacture of guns started.

In 1836 the works were bought by the Brothers Schneider, and it is a significant fact that the German name of Schneider was to become the great rival of Krupp, the great German gun makers. From that date down to the present time the Creusot guns began to become famous.

The great superiority of the French gun lies in its stability and in the fact that it will stand extreme hard wear. To show its wonderful stability, it may be mentioned that a glass of water placed on the rim of the wheel of the gun remains unspilled after the shot has been fired.

This extraordinary feat, impossible in the case of most guns, has been made possible by the clever application of a special recoil brake which Krupp always declared could not be fitted for field artillery. It was adopted at the Creusot works, however, and that is one point where the French guns are superior to the German.

Another feature of the Creusot guns is what is known as the recuperator, which causes the gun to return to its firing position. The force used is compressed air, possessing the advantage over many of the Krupp guns, in which springs are used, that it never wears out or loses its vigor.

Creusot guns were used in the Balkans, and army officers declared afterward that the guns were as good at the end of the campaign as before it. Only a short time before the German experts had criticised the famous gun as being too complicated and delicate for use in actual war.

The accuracy of fire of these guns is simply marvellous. Once the angle is set the gun continues to belch forth death with unvarying aim. French officers, too, are so expert in their use that they can split a tree three miles away after a couple of shots to get the range.

Taken all around, the Creusot guns not only fire more quickly than the Krupp weapons, but they are lighter and easier to move about. They are far more accurate and they last longer. There are four Creusot guns in a battery, each gun firing an average of twenty rounds a minute.

Occasionally we meet a man who looks as if he had tried to preserve his dignity in alcohol.

You can't always tell. Occasionally the toughest boy in the neighborhood grows up and becomes a minister.

About three weeks after marriage a woman discovers that the capital prize in the matrimonial lottery is still undrawn.

GERMANY'S GREATEST HOPE

PLANS TO INVADE ENGLAND IN THE NEAR FUTURE.

No Sacrifice Will Be Too Terrible by the German People to Attain Their Ends.

Charles N. Wheeler, staff correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, has written a review of the war situation from Aachen, Germany, in which he says:

Military experts, attaches, journalists, authors, short story writers and "Tommies" back from the trenches have discussed the future of the war.

As an American reporter, one who has observed the change that has taken place in Germany in the last few weeks, permit me not only to discuss the new objective of the German army but to indicate about where the first great battle may take place and what its immediate results may be.

This forecast is based on things I have seen, movements of troops, change of bases, preparations for the big battle, and the new dominating motive of all general plans of the German empire—the all comprehending motive of terrible hate for England.

Plans to Invade England.

Germany plans to invade England a plan that will be supported by a public opinion in the father-land without regard to the hazard, the ultimate result, or the slaughter that must reach a bewildering total.

The data based on personal observations and interviews throughout Belgium and in the frontier towns of Germany, and a certain alleged intuitive sense suggest that the supreme battle of the conflict, beside which the battles already occurring will be secondary, both with respect to the number of men engaged and the casualties, may be fought somewhere within the triangle described by Ostend on the Flemish coast, Calais on the French front, and Lille as the apex.

Plans No Longer Hidden.

To the so-called military experts this forecast may appear presumptuous. Yet it may be here set down with perfect propriety that the average reporter's prediction of events not far off in this Armageddon is about as good a guess as any. Military science, as the experts would understand it, in my opinion has been thrown to the four winds by the German war leaders in the last three weeks. That is, the general plan is no longer hidden.

To understand this one has to know by personal experience the awful hatred that has turned all public opinion in Germany into one channel and with but one objective—England.

After New Submarine Base.

Germany has announced boldly that it will stake everything on a dash to Calais and Dunkirk from the east and south and to Nieuport from the north with the avowed intention of establishing a new submarine base at the narrowest point of the channel with which to attack the English fleet to whittle it down.

Germany will not fight the English fleet with German battleships under the present relative armament. Germany definitely intends to put its undersea craft against English dreadnoughts hoping for such successful raids in time as will seriously cripple the naval power of the hated antagonist and bring about a more nearly equal strength.

To cross the English channel, destroy English shipping, invade the island, raze the coast towns, reduce London—to do this the German nation to-day would make many sacrifices humanly possible. Such a program may be untenable, but it will explain the movements of the last three weeks and movements that will be made in the next three or four weeks. However, a recurrence of the daring raid successfully made on the east coast at Scarborough and Whitby may be expected or at least attempted.

Hatred is Extraordinary.

The hatred felt toward England by the German people passes beyond the mere meaning of the word as used in the ordinary conversation. This feeling toward Great Britain pervades the fatherland and finds lodgment in the breast of all the people in the greed family of 25,000,000 souls.

POINTED PARAGRAPHS.

But a mute never fails due at the proper time.

The more relatives a man has the more he appreciates his friends.

A man isn't necessarily even a near-genius because he wears his hair long.

The ideal husband exists chiefly in the minds of women who never married.

Rich relatives are used by poor men as objects at which they can point with pride and expectancy.

Before a wise girl attempts to manage a husband she first acquires the art of managing a kitchen.

The Darkest Hour;

Or, The Hope That Still Lived.

CHAPTER V.—(Continued).

Minutes passed in which no further word was spoken. The two who loved only looked into each other's face. It was the man who broke that threatening silence at last.

"Oh, my heart's desire, how ill you look! How pale and worn and suffering! Where have you been, Isolde? What are you doing that you could not come here earlier to welcome me?

"Did not Mrs. Winston tell you? I have been nursing a dying child. It died an hour ago. The poor little thing was only six years old. Its mother caused by a brutal kick from its drunken father. That is murder, surely, truly as if he had taken up a knife and wielded the knife. She drew a deep breath. "Oh, Brian, what miseries and sins and woes there are in this world! I never knew this before—I never dreamt of it before—but now that I am in the midst of it—now that I see—

She had sunk on to one of the hard, wooden chairs, and now she leaned her tired head down upon the deal table, and was into a passion of bitter tears and wild, choking sobs. Brian Hardy bent over her in alarm, trying to raise her head and see and kiss her tear-wet, hidden face.

Christine! Christine!" he appealed to her. "Darling, look at me! You pain me to brush my heart! It is half broken already with the thought that I have let you work too hard and too unceasingly that I have let you see sights you should not see, and that words and sights of misery must poison your whole life. I have let you wear yourself out and ruin your splendid health upon me! Your very patience is a terrible reproach to me—a more terrible reproach than any words could be. Isolde, I am so ashamed during these past few months that it is hardly like the same face as that which won my worship years ago, and whose beauty was so radiant, so glowing, when first you came and joined Sybil's party to help me. And you who have been the cause of th's change! Oh, my darling, my darling, can you ever forgive me? I shall never be able to forgive myself!"

He began to walk anxiously up and down the little room as he spoke. "Mrs. Winston Sturgess was talking to me about yourself and my future this morning," he said after another interval of silence, broken only by the sound of the heavy-hearted girl's sobbing. "She told me that so today was New Year's Eve he left he had a right to tell me what was in his heart concerning me. I told her that I might say to me anything that he pleased; how should he not do so when he is my guardian and the man on earth to whom everything—even my very life, for I assume surely have died of starvation if he had not rescued me and fed and educated me. And he said—listen, Christine!—he said that it depended on him that I was wasting my existence, and that for my own sake, as well as for yours, I ought to put an end to this state of wandering and procuring and helping those who cannot help themselves. He said that the time has now arrived for me to settle in practice as a doctor, for the purpose not merely of earning my own livelihood, but of building up my own personal fortune. He further said that to his interest it to me was desirable he should spend a large sum of money in buying for me a practice in a West End district, where my success would be assured by the time Christine had lifted her face.

"And what answer did you give him?"

"I gave him an answer which hurt him. I refused his offer. That was cruel of me, her. But I did not know then all that your face tells me now. I see more than the help which I owe to my fellow-creatures is as nothing after all compared with the duty which I owe to you, Christine! I am going to accept Mr. Winston's generous offer. I am going to accept it for your sake, and for the sake of our future and happiness. We can help the poor and the suffering in our settled life as well as here and now. And otherwise you would have to go away from me and rest. Would you like that? Whereas, now—"

Breaking off in his words, he went back to where she was sitting and, stooping over her again, he drew her tired figure into his arms and held her head against his breast, raising kisses on her lips, her pale cheeks, her tear-wet eyes, her hair, and her chin, rippling hair. The thrush of the winter above them was keen and icy, but what entered into that little room was romance of the moonlight and the snow outside, more than mairhed one by that warmer romance of life which wrapped them round, making the interior of the little tent like an enchanted palace, wherein nothing mean or sordid or painful could enter!

But calamity could enter, and calamity was entering now. Mrs. Winston announced it—little dreaming what it was that she was announcing—as she appeared now in the doorway with a sudden and startling message.

"Lady Dare has come and is in the caravan, asking to see Christine. She looks alarmingly pale and ill, and her manner is terribly strange. I am afraid something terrible must have happened. I always feel that the terrible things in life are likely to happen on a New Years Eve."

Christine Dare looked in amazement from Mrs. Winston to Brian. Then she moved towards the doorway of the tent.

"I had better go alone," she said.

"Christine!" Brian Hardy rushed to her as if he would hold her back. "Christine, before you go, promise me one thing. It shall be our wedding day," he panted. He was not strong yet, and sudden emotion had made him feel his weakness. "It must be soon—in three weeks' time. Tell me what day it shall be. I have a sudden presentiment that if I do not say it now I shall never be able to ask you again."

CHAPTER VI.

"Christine, you must choose the day before I let you go," Brian Hardy repeated feverishly, while his detaining hand held back the girl he loved from the open doorway towards which she had been hastening. His hold was very gentle, but at the same time firm, with a command in it.

He went on speaking, quickly and passionately: "I do not know what the errand that your mother's is my concern, means sorrow to you and me. I do not know why I think so. I only know that the thought has forced itself upon my mind, and that I am afraid. It will make me braver, stronger, and times happier, if I know once and for all on which day I may call you by each other those words which will make it impossible for any human power to separate us. Christine, will it be Twelfth Day; shall it—our marriage—be on the 22nd of January? Say yes, Christine. Oh, love, why not?"

A soft sweet smile illumined the countenance she so earnest it more fully back to the lamplight—"Brian—"

"Surely, Brian, you are not afraid that anything could part us now? she said in surprise, and with tender reproach.

"Surely you are not afraid of that? Why, we have loved already all that we can love, that could possibly rise up against us. How can we fear anything now—that is, provided God has mercy on us?" he added, of course, we have something to fear. But in that lies our only danger."

"It is not that danger that I am thinking of," the young preacher returned quickly and excitedly. "I can take care of myself in that way. God to help me. The man, whoever he may be, that wants my life will have it hard to kill me who stands on the threshold of such joy and such honor as marriage with you will bring to me. I am on my guard now, he will not try poison again, and if he attacks me in any other way I shall fight hard. It is from your side that the blow which I am dreading will fall if it should fall at all. Of course, I may be mistaken. I pray Heaven that it may be so. My presentiment, it is because of my bodily weakness that sudden shame and fear have come to me like this without cause—or seemingly without cause. But even if it be so, I still ask you to tell me the day of our wedding before you leave me now."

"Why, I shall come back to you here in ten minutes, bringing my mother with me," Christine returned, going on to say what she could against the deadly fear which overpowered her, so that she might laugh a little silvery laugh of soothing reassurance. "You must not give way to these thoughts, Brian. They will make you ill again. And as for the date—I shall not be able to think about it, or to name it, now."

"Christine, Christine, if indeed you love me, tell me now! I cannot wait till tomorrow. Something within me seems to warn me that I must not wait until to-morrow. Tell me now. Oh, my love, my love, why will you not? Are you afraid of being too happy?"

Mrs. Winston had gone out again into the night, and Brian took the woman he loved into his arms, and, holding her close against his heart, drew back her tired head until it rested upon his shoulder. His dominant eyes, as well as his low, eager voice entreated her. He thought how the weight of the dark coils of her sunny, rippling hair must make her head droop yet more heavily when free of sleep and the chaos of a room where poverty and sickness sat had tried her once again until strength until she came home exhausted as to-night.

"Say that our marriage shall be on the 22nd of January, Christine—say the, dearest, if indeed you love me."

"If I love you, Brian?" She put up her thin, worn hand, still scarred and painful, but too slowly now after the months of hard toil and harder anxiety which had weakened her, and, clasping both hands about his neck, drew his face down to hers and kissed him. "Can you doubt any more now that I love you, Brian?" she asked him in a soft, trembling whisper.

She sifted a moment before saying more, and her face, as she looked up, was praying inwardly for guidance in answering his pleading. At the end of a moment she spoke again very softly.

"Yes, I will give you my promise to marry you on the twenty-second; that is, unless my mother should have some grave reason for objecting to our wedding taking place on that day."

Over the tired haggardness of her sweet, young face there had shone suddenly a light of joy and of hope so wonderful, so really radiant, that the man whom she had blessed with the promise of the highest gift that a woman can give could almost have knelt before her in the flood of his passionate devotion.

"God bless you, now and always, and God teach me how to be worthy of you, and how to make you happy, and how to love you always as you should be loved," he said unsteadily.

Then he loosed his clasp of her, and let her go through the moonlight and across the snow to where her mother waited for her. He watched her out of sight, and covered grace. How upright her young figure was in spite of its fatigue, and how gracefully she moved!

He sank down on to a chair by the table and, his forces for the time in hands, called silently to Heaven a deep, outpouring flood of thankfulness and praise for the first, and then more deep and humble and passionate still thanksgiving for her.

"I wonder if it is a sin to love her like that?" he asked himself aloud in the silence of the tent.

CHAPTER VII.

Lady Dare, usually so soft and gentle in her movements, was stumbling and wayward, blindly, and desperately to and fro in the interior of the caravan. A single glance at her face told Christine that something of a very grave nature must have happened since the hour when the past six months she had seen her mother's composure tried and met with trouble after trouble, but she had never before seen it changed as it was changed now. Her face was as white as the snow outside, where the feeble yellow rays of the common oil lamp suspended from the centre of the roof did not fall upon him, holding her clasp of her mother, she went towards him.

"Lord Southport! How do you do? Mrs. Winston did not tell me that you were here," she said, with a forced attempt, in spite of the sharp anxiety which her mother's aspect had aroused in her, "It is very kind of you to drop in on this New Years Eve visit."

"You needn't say 'so,'" objected the Earl of Yoxford's son and heir, in a voice which struck her as rather brighter than she had expected his voice would be. "It is none only to see you—and, of course, to accompany your mother. And now I think I'll go out and walk up and down in the snow a bit until you and your mother have got your business over. It'll be absolutely cold outside, but it's one of the awful places these hideous northern subterranean Londons are—but your mother thinks she'll get on better with you alone than with me making a third."

He went out, falling over the numerous things that in the cramped little place were unavoidably in the way of his long stride. Lady Dare made no answer to his going. It was evident that the talk she wished to have with her daughter was of a highly important character. Left alone with Christine, she sank down on the plain wooden bench that ran along below the windows on one side of the somewhat curiously furnished little interior, and burst into a storm of wild, despairing sobs.

In an instant, Christine's arms were again about the neck of the girl. Her features white, tired face was bent close to the equally white and more pitifully haggard face of the delicate, invalid mother, whose once charming prettiness had almost departed from her during the last few months.

Mother, something terrible has happened! I know it as soon as I saw your face. Is my father ill? Or has she had news something to do with Ronald? Have you found him?"

"No. It has nothing to do with Ronald," she answered quickly. She lifted her head, met blue eyes, and it seemed to her that for the first time in her life she saw flinching fear in them and a strange, unsettling shame. And she trembled at the voice went on—"What I have come here to say to you concerns yourself, Christine. I have come to tell you that circumstances have arisen which must compel you to give up all idea of marrying Mr. Hardy, and instead to accept that proposal of Lord Southport which you gave him once before, and which you have since that young preacher must unfortunately come across your path."

Christine forced her clasp of her mother's trembling figure and drew back, straightening herself to upright grace. The shadow upon her young and lovely face had deepened and darkened.

"Mother!" she exclaimed reproachfully. There had been a touch of indignation mingled with the reproach. "I thought you knew that it is too late now to try to turn my heart from Brian Hardy. Have you forgotten what you read when we stood by his bedside in that unspeakably terrible hour when it seemed more likely that he would die than live? Have you forgotten how you said to me then that if he lived you would never try to turn him from me again?"

"No, dear child, I have not forgotten," Lady Dare replied quickly. "I want what I said then. I mean it so keenly that I have since been trying to persuade your father to regard Brian Hardy as a man worthy of you. But since then things have happened which at last to night forced me to break my word. I have been driven into a despair and terrible position, from which only you can save me."

The girl looked at her mother in startled consternation. Through all the perils of her childhood and early girlhood she had looked upon her semi-invalid mother as one of the brightest, most serene and sunny-natured of human creatures. Whereas, now—

She shuddered at thought of the change which only a few months had wrought in that gentle face. Some terrible fear had been about her mother like a hovering cloud of blackest, most threatening gloom.

Christine, only you can save me. The agitated voice once more broke the cold stillness of that strange, dim-lit, fur-lined tent of a caravan. It spoke only too plainly for Lady Dare, despairing of mind and soul that she should have paid no heed whatever to her odd surroundings. Very conspicuously did the harsh contrast with those surroundings in her rich driving cloak of heavy black velvet bordered with sable, beneath which glimpses could be caught of the jet-embroidered lining of a black velvet gown. In comparison with the richness of clothing the glass black cloth frock of the girl standing before her appeared a hundred gold pianos even than usual. Had it not been for the nameless distinction which enabled Christine to bear with the utmost stable stamp of refinement and good breeding, a stranger casually looking in might have taken her for a servant. And these two women were mother and daughter!

"Christine, only you can save me. The desperate, appealing tones came again. And one of the mothers hands had made stole out and caught one of the hands of the daughter. The cruel hands were chapped still, perhaps they would never lose that shapeliness which had been their gift at birth but the hard work which they had daily done had roughened them to a degree which brought tears to Christine's eyes as she pressed the clasp for the first time.

"Oh, my poor girl! my poor girl!" she cried in a wonderful pity for the guilty. "You are in great distress, so good a friend of the family that seems to you right to help you suffer from it now. I, who should comfort you, can only strike you the cruellest blow of all. But you must accept the blow, Christine. A child owes a duty to a mother, and—"

"Mother, you are not speaking as the first words fluttered she knelt beside her mother, clasping tight in both her own hands the white hand which had been stretched out to her in beseeching. A child does owe a duty to her mother, and I am a terrible one to have failed in it. I have left you to bear alone the cruelest, selfish sorrow, and I had no idea that all thick and fast as it has plainly seemed to me as if the curse of God—anger had attacked you. Mother, I will do anything to help you. If you wish it I will give up this mission which I have undertaken, and will continue to live at home with you and my father. Or I will go and search for Ronald, poor, disgraced Ronald, the very sound of whose London, or in any part of the earth where it is likely that he has hidden himself. I will do anything, I will suffer anything, to help you; anything but give up Brian Hardy. I cannot do that!"

"You must do that. You will have to do that," the mother insisted in a dry voice. "Christine, I did not say that I wanted you only to help me. I told you that I required you to save me. That is a very different thing. Christine, I am in a very dangerous position. If the danger threatened myself alone, I should not care so much. I might manage them to get out of it somehow alone, if even were by taking them, or by contriving to meet with some tragic fatal accident. But it threatens you and Ronald also; it threatens you even more than it does myself. And at the same time, you know that the mere fact of your giving up Brian Hardy and promising yourself again to Lord Southport, the peer will disappear. In any wonder, then, that I have come to you like this to-night to beg from you not only for my own rescue from disgrace, but also for yours and your brother's?"

AMERICA'S PROTEST TO GREAT BRITAIN.

By Chas. M. Bice, Denver, Colo.

Perhaps no single incident of the great war has awakened more interest in the two great English-speaking nations than the protest filed by the United States against the treatment of American shipping by the British fleet.

The despatches also indicate that the protest is arousing keen interest across the waters, as the matter is being widely discussed in the public press. As indicating the deep interest involved, a special meeting of the British Cabinet has been called to consider the protest, and this morning's papers declare the Cabinet new to disruption in the debate on the subject.

In this country among a certain class, there is a suspicion that unfortunately amounts almost to a hope that this protest holds a promise of war between the two countries.

There is always quite a large class in every nation, who want to see trouble, but these howlers for revenge are generally the last to enlist when the trouble comes. They glory in trouble and contention, but they want somebody else to make it and to suffer the consequences. They are of the mole variety of heroes, ever ready to throw bricks when concealed from danger by the people surrounding them. Happily that class is not very strong in this country.

Sober, thoughtful, sensible men and women do not invite distress and suffering that would be sure to result were this country involved in the European struggle. They are not influenced by false sentiments of so-called "National honor," and the "rights of American seamen," to the extent of wishing to see this country rush into a controversy that means great loss of life and property until, at least, that it has been clearly established that the "national honor" has been needed, or our rights have been needlessly interfered with by other.

On the contrary, America's protest to Great Britain was made in a spirit of friendship, and affords no basis for war talk, for it had been received in the same spirit.

The treatment of neutral shipping by belligerent nations is always a very delicate subject, and one requiring the best minds, thoroughly trained in the field of international law and diplomacy, to adjust. It will be recalled that troubles arose over shipping between this country and Great Britain during our great Civil War, and which were not settled till long after the war had ceased.

Though differing somewhat in character from those cited in the protest to Great Britain this week, they held a genuine threat of war, a true casus belli, for the reason that it was then openly charged that Great Britain was purposely aiding the Confederacy in its efforts to destroy the shipping of the North. There is no such claim or contention involved in the present protest. The old controversy was peacefully settled, and the two countries have ever since remained on the most friendly terms. There is nothing now existing that approaches the seriousness of the Alabama claims and the dispute that arose out of them.

I have no doubt that this country will insist upon full reparation for any real damage done to American shipping, caused by any unwarranted interference of the British fleet; and I am equally certain that British justice will gladly recompense for such damages, when duly established.

It is quite inevitable that the fleet should wrongfully detain some shipping in its eagerness to find contraband goods and prevent them reaching the enemy, and to this end no doubt the war fleet has been instructed to detain and search vessels suspected of having contraband articles aboard, or conditional contraband intended for the enemy.

It looks as though the real question at issue is, regarding the treatment of conditional contraband goods. That this should be treated exactly as absolute contraband and seized and conveyed to British ports for disposition, works a very great hardship upon shippers. But even so, I have no doubt that Great Britain is willing to co-operate with this country, and with every other country, in having strictly up to the laws of nations in their treatment of neutral shipping. The protest is only a business precedure between two friends, who have been foremost in preserving the peace of the world. That they should forget their friendship and undertake to settle their business differences by the sword is too ridiculous for consideration.

The period that has elapsed since the treaty of Ghent was signed 100 years ago on Christmas eve, has not been without acute crises in the relations of England and the United States. Had England pursued a policy of callous greed, she might easily have made the preservation of the Union impossible in 1861-65 by intervention on behalf of the Confederacy; and again in 1898 she might have formed a coalition with Spain. That these things were not done shows the strength of the bond between the two nations. Many have been the explanations of the vast volumes of American sympathy with England in the present great struggle, but the undying truth is that this sympathy is rooted in the organic life of the two great English-speaking nations, and by itself affords a unique and surpassing celebration of the Century of peace just closed between these nations.

America knows that the independence of the new world is due to the very conditions that made England an arbiter of Europe's destinies, and instinctively she knows that England's downfall would expose this entire hemisphere to devastating wars from which it might never recover.

Why should the over-sea democracies hate England when every true democracy on the earth finds in England its prototype, its patron and its strength? And in turn, it may be said with equal truth that England's strength would not be what it is to-day had she not the sympathy and moral support of every true democracy on earth.

That the rounding out of the century of peace between England and the United States finds the two countries nearer together in political aspirations and common sympathy is a tremendous fact, and portends the glory and triumph of both nations.

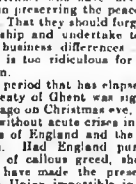
A ZOUAVE HERO.

He Sacrificed His Life for Beloved France.

A rare and stirring incident of personal heroism is that recorded in a semiofficial notice given out in Paris on the afternoon of November 23rd:

"The other day, in Belgium, a German column was advancing to attack a position in the forest of Brie, defended by a detachment of Zouaves. Our men noticed that before them the Germans forced a France prisoner, and at the same time they heard cries of 'Stop firing!' For an instant our riflemen and the men in charge of our machine guns hesitated. Then from the German ranks they heard the voice of the Zouave prisoner, who called to them 'shoot comrades!'

"There then flashed out from the ranks of the Zouaves a general discharge of rifles and machine guns. The fire laid low the assailants of the Zouaves, and with them fell the heroic soldier whose devotion made it possible for his countrymen to checkmate the ruse of the enemy.



"If the name of the brave man is unknown to the world, at least his regiment will retain forever the remembrance of his sacrifice, which is equal to any of the most famous instances of personal heroism recorded in our glorious history."

War! War!

"Grouchey is a confirmed pessimist, isn't he?"

"Yes. Just now he is worrying about who will bury the last man on earth."

"Wouldn't you like," his mother asked a little boy, "wouldn't you like to give your toy boat to that poor orphan who hasn't any father?" The little boy looked at his toy boat and frowned. "Could we not give him father instead?" he asked

Farmers' Institute

Afternoon Meeting Best Attended for Years

The meeting on Friday afternoon in the town hall brought out a larger attendance of farmers than for several years past, and all took a live interest in the subjects that were discussed.

"Dual Purpose Cattle" was the subject taken up by Mr R. Murphy, who hails from Sarnia. In opening the speaker pointed out that Ontario breed to have gone in largely for making a specialization of particular breeds of beef or dairy cattle as the most lucrative plan to follow. But fluctuations in market values make it desirable to raise a class of cattle that would be in demand for either purpose, and would pay both at the pail and in the butcher market. Mr Murphy reviewed the merits of three milking breeds and three beef breeds to show the standing each would make in the dual purpose class. The Jersey yields the richest milk, her cream containing the largest percentage of butter fat, but a Jersey steer is practically of no value for beef, in fact it would pay better to knock the calf in the head than raise it. The Ayrshire cow will produce more milk than the Jersey, but not so rich, and a steer of this breed is a little better for beef than a Jersey, but no farmer can make money out of an Ayrshire beef stock. From Holstein herd owners there are wonderful reports as to milk production. The Holstein meat is dark and coarse, and the breed is not adapted to furnishing beef supply. The Polled Angus are the prettiest cattle to be seen to-day. Herds present an attractive uniformity of appearance that goes to increase their value on the hoof, but they will never do for dairying. The Hereford develop faster than any other beef breed, but are not for dairy production either. If we are to find a dual purpose strain to-day, therefore, it must be from the Shorthorns. From this breed there are produced the best type of milkers which at the same time make admirable beef animals. It is a fact that London, England, is supplied with milk from Shorthorns. The Baker strain of English Shorthorns have some remarkable records. In one years one cow produced 9000 pounds of milk yearly, another gave 10000 pounds yearly for ten years. The speaker drew a comparison would show that the Shorthorns raised on our farms years ago possessed better milking qualities than those of to-day. This was due to the process of breeding for beef, which gradually eliminated the milking qualities. Scotch and English milking Shorthorns bring more dollars than the Holstein. There is a demand for the dual purpose strain, and just as sure as some cattle can be bred for beef and others for milk, so can dual purpose cattle be bred. Mr Murphy advised paying special attention to the selection of a milking strain bull. Take one that has reached maturity—either 10 years old than 2 years old. See that the milk record is behind him. The characteristic type of milking strain is greater length of neck and hook, and more wedge shaped than the beef strain.

Mr F. M. Johnston, of Boston, Ont., expounded the subject of "Corn and the Silo." In his home section it is the practice to work corn in a rotation and sow on alfalfa sod. Partake the all the land in the fall and there is little trouble breaking it up in the spring. Plow early and work the land over on same day that it is plowed. They are getting away from the idea of putting in corn by 24th of May. The best crop he ever had was planted on June 12th. Plant in hills with hand planter, in check rows 42 inches apart. Harrow about three times before the plants are big enough to cultivate, and so keep top loam worked up so as to conserve moisture. In cultivating growing corn get farther away from the hills each time to avoid roots being cut. The better corn is matured before putting in the silo the better fodder it makes. The best varieties are Selected Leaming, Compton's Early, White Cap, Yellow Dent, and Wisconsin No. 7. His preference is White Cap. Buy all seed on the cob, as the best is shipped out that way, while the more inferior is shelled. Test germinating strength of your seed. Mr Johnston has bought seed of which only 18 to 25 per cent would grow. It is important therefore, to procure seed in time to make test. The more vigorous grains germinate in three to four days. Moisten well with warm water and leave in a shallow pan covered with paper, or plant in moist earth. Whenever corn matures in your patch a selection of the best ears should be made therefrom, a day or two before cutting for the silo. Pick out individual stalks that are free from smut, etc., and take the cobs that are a little below the centre of stalk length. By selecting in this way will make a difference of two weeks earlier maturity in your crop. Mr Johnston's selection for several years in succession had proved an object lesson to himself. His experimental plots had demonstrated the results very clearly. It is possible to develop a good long ear, also extra circumference and greater length of kernel. Careful selection of seed corn for two years will add 15 to 25 per cent to yield of ears. If we can get an increase of 10 per cent this would show the selected seed corn is worth $25 per bushel more than unselected seed. Advised farmers here to select their own every season it matures, as on account of acclimatization the next year's crop would mature two weeks earlier. For the filling Mr Johnston mentioned a device employed with good results. This is a stop board at the top inside of strong planks with a hopper underneath, from which a sack shute was extended to the bottom, the sacks being overlapped some and pinned together by using two inch nails. This shute can be shortened at will. To preserve the contents two or three loads of cut straw should be put in at the top, then load on three loads of manure over that. If corn is well matured when cut it will be liable to dry mould in the silo. Running a half-inch stream of water in while filling will prevent the mould. There is no water required unless the corn is well matured, or if cut following a rainfall. Silo contents will keep better if trampled down well. The silo is one made of matched lumber on outside and cement plastered inside, with an air space between. This style is more expensive than concrete.

Mr Johnston also gave a short talk on "Alfalfa Growing." Probably, he said, the most of those who do not meet with success in growing alfalfa have taken down in the seed selection. We can't expect results from southern grown seed. Get home grown, from your neighbors, if possible. There is plenty of seed in this province of the Ontario Variegated or the Grimm varieties. In handling the fertilizer bacteria Mr Johnston warned that exposure to sunlight while in the bottle would render it useless, as would also exposing the seed to light and draft while drying, or left to dry in the drill. It might as well be emptied on the ground in the first place as used in those careless ways. For alfalfa sowing he advised thorough fall plowing, then continuous cultivation from spring up to sowing time. Barley is the best nurse crop, sown three pecks to the acre, the alfalfa seed 14 or 15 pounds to the acre. Do not stook the barley when cut. Cure it quickly and get it off the field as soon as possible so that the tender young alfalfa plants will not be smothered by it. Land must be clean for seeding.

In his evening address Mr. Johnston discussed "Poultry and Poultry Profits." He pointed out that Canada is importing millions of dozens of eggs because our farmers do not realize the profits that are made in this branch of their occupation. The poultre flocks are just allowed to go along without any special attention. At starting in one should choose some pure breed. There is nothing nicer to see than a flock of hens of one variety. The utility breeds are the best to try. The Graham type of open front house was recommended as the best type to adopt, as tuberculosis has become prevalent among poultry, and open air treatment is the only way to combat that disease. The front should be entirely open, with chick wire to keep the poultry in and the sparrows out. There should be a good door to one end and a large window in the other to ventilate in summer. From 8 to 10 square feet of floor space should be kept to each dozen of the Minorcas or Leghorns. The curtain front is alright where there is always some one to attend to raising and lowering it. The speaker found no difficulty in eggs thoroughly hatching left open even in very cold weather. In feeding use all the grain possible—grain in the morning and evening, with a green feed of cabbage, mangolds or alfalfa at noon. Feed as late in the evening as convenient so as to keep the birds off the roosts as late as possible, and there will be enough left to induce them to get down to scratching early in the morning. Hens lay best in the spring, when there is plenty of green feed and also sunny mornings. Milk and ground bone is a good addition to the hen feed—two pounds of bone twice a week for 50 birds. Use a bone grinder to cut bones procured from the butcher. Cold nights might call for a little corn, but corn is too fattening for free feeding. For hatching chicks by the hundreds to be sold as broilers, etc., the incubator may be used to advantage, but to raise smaller flocks of layers the old hen is preferable for bringing out chicks. Select for hatching eggs those laid by vigorous hens of two years, paying special attention to type in choosing the hens. The best producers lay eggs in the forenoon. In selling a hen don't use a leg straw bottom. Moisture is required for eggs in the nest, so get a big sod with plenty of green grass, a little straw and some tobacco leaves is keep away the vermin. Most of hens that quit setting are driven off by lice, and young chicks die off from the same cause. Chicks should not be fed before 36 hours old. Granulated oatmeal can then be given, and cracked when they are older, but no mash feeds. Philo coops can be used to good advantage in rearing chicks up to six weeks old. After that they may be put on a range in the orchard or in a corn field, where a feeder or two holding four or five bushels of grain may be placed, with the exception of refilling the feeders the flocks will be no more trouble until they have to be taken under cover in the fall. Better fattening farms are doing quite a business, and the farmers are selling their flocks allowing those fellows to get the profit instead of fattening them on the farm.

Miss Suzie Campbell, of Brantford, the Women's Institute delegate, was the next speaker, and in the course of a fluent and interesting address she logically and ably vindicated the position of woman in our young nation. The Women's Institute has collected $25,000 for Red Cross work, and women had largely discarded the pink tea function while engaging in the work of society. In alluding to the agitation for the franchise for the fair sex, Miss Campbell stated that she had never met a woman yet who could talk politics well. She feared the ladies would be induced to vote for the best looking men. What Canada wants to-day is manly men and womanly women, and the best training of the home woman can find her opportunity to leave her influence upon the nation by training of her family. To-day 3/5 the home is to uplift the nation, and it is to the influence of women that we owe this uplift. The secret of the success of our Dominion is that everywhere is found the home with a woman at the head of it. The home was the first institution and it will remain forever. To cast the best influence upon those around us we should go about smiling and talk happiness. Farming is the finest of occupations, and it is the dull boy of all that it made the farmer. It should be the cleverest boy, as the farmer requires to be a student, mechanic and builder, a master of agriculture, versed in science, capable in business and well educated. Speaking of education Miss Campbell argued that a good school inspires some of property in both town and country in which it is located. Sanitary school buildings reduce the doctor's bills greatly. Women are advocates of consolidated schools. One of Miss Campbell's concluding points was that men desire their wisdom from the cultivated minds of women.

"Some of the Needs of Ontario Agriculture" was the subject of the concluding address by Mr Munday. Old methods, he said, would not be adequate to meet present day conditions. Farmers, he alleged, are losing more through bad seed than in any other way, the mixture and uncleaned article being largely responsible for the loss. Government inspection of seed does not stand for anything, except that the label shows the grade of seed in a bag. A chart was displayed giving the following tabulated statement as to the gradation of seed under the regulations and the number of noxious seeds in each grade

	Noxious weed seeds to 1 oz	to bush
2	10	9,600
3	40	38,400
4	160	153,600
Red Clover, Extra No. 1	0	0
2	5	4,800
3	20	19,200
4	80	76,800

No. 1 extra must be without any noxious weeds of any kind in it, and is the only grade to use. Never buy seed that has any noxious weed seeds mixed with it. Many farmers are keeping animals on their premises that are nothing but boarders eating up the profits. The continued decrease in our seed population is such that living in towns is still becoming more expensive. There never was a time when our country called so loudly for agriculturists as to-day. There is need of more co-operation among farmers and farmers' clubs should be organized as through these clubs co-operative plans could be carried out.

For the evening programme there was an interspersion of good music by the orchestra.

HOCKEY NOTES

The junior hockey team journeyed to Cargill on Thursday last and defeated the juniors of that burg by 4-3 in a close and strenuous game. The Paisley boys were rather handicapped by the small ice surface, and failed to get their team play working.

OWES HER LIFE TO "FRUIT-A-TIVES"

Cured Both Stomach Trouble and Headaches

PALMERSTON, ONT., JUNE 20th, 1913.

"I really believe that I owe my life to "Fruit-a-tives". Ever since childhood, I have been under the care of physicians and have been paying doctor's bills. I was so sick and worn out that people on the street often asked me if I thought I could get along without help. The same old Stomach Trouble and distressing Headaches nearly drove me wild. Sometime ago, I got a box of "Fruit-a-tives" and the first box did me good. My husband was delighted and advised a continuation of their use.

Today, I am feeling fine, and a physician meeting me on the street, noticed my improved appearance and asked the reason. I replied, "I am taking Fruit-a-tives". He said, "Well, if Fruit-a-tives are making you look so well, go ahead and take them. They are doing more for you than I can".

Mrs. H. S. WILLIAMS.

"Fruit-a-tives" are sold by all dealers at 50c., a box. 6 for $2.50, trial size 25c. or sent postpaid on receipt of price by Fruit-a-tives Limited, Ottawa.

FIELD CROPS, 1914

The Dominion Census and Statistics Office has issued its final report on the yield and value of field crops in 1914. The report states that, in marked contrast to 1913, the season proved particularly unfavourable to the growth of grain. Persistent drought throughout the greater part of the Northwest provinces resulted in a yield per acre of the chief cereals lower than in any season since 1910 and lower than the average of the six years ended 1913. In Ontario and Quebec, though the grain crops suffered from a dry season, the conditions were not so unfavorable, whilst in the Maritime provinces a favorable season resulted in good returns.

YIELD OF GRAIN CROPS

For the whole of Canada the area estimated to be sown to field crops was 35,102,175 acres, as compared with 35,375,430 acres in 1913, but owing to the drought the total productive area in 1914 was reduced to 33,440,075 acres. Upon this area the total production of grain crops in bushels was as follows: wheat 161,280,000 as against 231,717,000 in 1913, oats 313,078,000 against 404,669,000, barley 36,203,000 against 48,319,000, rye 2,016,800 against 2,300,000, peas 3,362,500 against 3,951,800, beans 797,500 against 793,300, buckwheat 8,626,000 against 8,372,000, mixed grains 16,382,500 against 15,792,000, flax 7,175,200 against 17,539,000, and corn for husking 13,924,000 against 16,468,000 bushels. The yields per acre were in bushels as follows: Fall wheat 21.41 compared with 23.29 in 1913, spring wheat 15.07 against 20.81, all wheat 15.67 against 21.04, oats 31.12 against 38.78, barley 24.21 against 29.96, rye 18.12 against 19.28, peas 17.64 against 18.05, beans 18.20 against 17.19, buckwheat 24.34 against 21.09, mixed grains 35.36 against 33.53, flax 6.62 against 11.30 and corn for husking 54.393 against 60.30.

VALUE OF CROPS

Computed at average local market prices the value of these crops in 1914 were as follows: Wheat $196,318,000, oats $151,817,000, barley $21,557,000, rye $1,679,300, peas $4,895,000, beans $1,884,300, buckwheat $6,213,000, mixed grains $10,759,400, flax $7,368,000 and corn for husking $9,808,000. For all field crops, including root and fodder crops, the total value amounts to $639,061,300, as compared with $562,771,900 in 1913, the increase of $86,289,800 being chiefly due to the enhancement of prices, which has thus more than counterbalanced the low yields of grain in consequence of the drought.

NORTHWEST PROVINCES

In the three northwest provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta the production in 1914 of wheat is placed at 140,958,000 bushels compared with 209,262,000 bushels in 1913, of oats at 159,843,000 bushels compared with 242,413,000 bushels and of barley at 19,535,000 bushels compared with 31,660,000 bushels. The wheat production of 1914 in Manitoba was 38,645,000 bushels from 2,646,000 acres, in Saskatchewan 73,491,000 bushels from 5,348,300 acres and in Alberta 28,859,000 bushels from 1,371,000

REMARKABLE CASE of Mrs. HAM

Declares Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Saved Her Life and Sanity.

Shamrock, Mo.—"I feel it my duty to tell the public the condition of my health before using your medicine. I had falling, inflammation and congestion, female weakness, pains in both sides, backaches and bearing down pains, was short of memory, nervous, impatient, passed sleepless nights, and had neither strength nor energy. There was always a fear and dread in my mind, I had cold, nervous, weak spells, hot flashes over my body. I had a place in my right side that was so sore that I could hardly bear the weight of my clothes. I tried medicine and doctors, but they did me little good, and I never expected to get out again. I got Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and Blood Purifier, and I certainly would have been in grave or in an asylum if your medicine had not saved me. But now I can work all day, sleep well at night, eat anything I want, have no hot flashes or weak, nervous spells. All pains, aches, fears and dreads are gone, my house, children and husband are no longer neglected, as I am almost entirely free of the bad symptoms I had before taking your remedies, and all is pleasure and happiness in my home."—Mrs. JOHN HAM, R. F. D. 1, Box 22, Shamrock, Missouri.

Mr Jas Begg met with a nasty accident a week ago. He was removing rafters from an old barn when he lost his balance and fell to the ground, sustaining internal injuries. We are glad to note that he is on a fair way to recovery.

Mr Angus McDonald, 2nd con, held a successful farm stock sale last week. We understand he is retiring from farming and is going to live in Southampton. He has sold his farm to Mr Arch Shipley, of 6th con.

Mrs Albert Osborne, of 2nd con Saugeen, is visiting on our line this week.

PACE—SWALWELL

A very interesting event took place at the residence of Mr and Mrs John Swalwell, Kinguf, on Tuesday, 12th inst. when their only daughter Miss Dorothy became the wife of Mr Geo Pace, a prosperous young farmer of the 8th con of Bruce Tp. The wedding was quiet, only immediate relatives being present. The pretty young bride was gowned in blue silk with white trimmings and flowers, and leaning on the arm of her father entered the parlor and modestly took her place beside the lucky young man who is to be congratulated in his choice of a life partner. Rev Mr Holland, of Bervie, securely tied the mystic knot which made the happy couple one. After the ceremony and congratulations were over the guests were invited to the dining room where a dainty wedding supper awaited them. The bride's travelling suit was of blue lady's cloth with hat and plume to match. The presents were useful and costly. The young couple will reside on the groom's farm on the 8th con Bruce, and will be at home to their many friends after the 25th inst.

Valuable Information for the Travelling Public

Attention is called to excellent night service from Toronto to Montreal and Ottawa via Canadian Pacific. Train No. 21 leaving Toronto Union Station at 11.45 p.m. daily, carries electric lighted sleepers, compartment observation car from Toronto to Montreal, and Toronto to Ottawa. This train runs via Lake Ontario Shore line, due Montreal 8.55 a.m. daily the Ottawa sleeper arriving in Ottawa 7.25 a.m. daily. Smoking is permitted in the lounge or observation room of the Buffet Library Observation Compartment Car Toronto to Montreal, and arrangements have been made whereby porters on this car will press clothes for passengers at very reasonable charges.

Being the last train from Toronto for Montreal and Ottawa, it gives the travelling public the opportunity of spending the entire evening with their families, or enables them to attend the theatre and other places of amusement, and still have plenty of time to take the train. Sleepers are placed for occupancy at 10.00 p.m. at Toronto Union Station, enabling passengers who so desire to retire at that time.

Dining Car is attached at Smiths Falls every morning, serving breakfast into Montreal, so that business men may proceed direct to their offices on appointments immediately on arrival.

The Canadian Pacific operates a high class passenger train from North Toronto station at 10.00 p.m. daily, carrying standard and electric lighted sleepers and compartment car for Montreal and sleeper Toronto to Ottawa. Train is due Montreal 7.35 a.m. daily, and Ottawa car reaches that point at 7.25 a.m. daily.

A solid night train is also operated from Toronto Union Station to Ottawa leaving Toronto at 10.30 p.m. daily, this train carrying standard electric lighted sleepers and compartment car, arriving Ottawa 7.25 a.m. daily. Carries from Smith Falls to Ottawa the standard sleepers for that point, leaving North Toronto at 10.50 p.m., and the standard sleepers leaving Toronto Union Station at 11.30 p.m. daily, so that Ottawa passengers may take their choice of either one of these three trains, and reach Ottawa at exactly the same time.

The Canadian limited No. 36 via lake Ontario shore line route leaves Toronto daily 9.00 a.m. for Montreal, connection at Smith Falls for Ottawa, stopping at important places, carrying observation parlor car, dining car, and first and second class coaches.

Children Cry
FOR FLETCHER'S
CASTORIA

Mayor Halliday and Reeve Brown were in Toronto getting information in regard to hydro-electric power. The gathering frets about the great white night so that when a meeting is held in Chesley after a by-law is submitted they can give full information, for with a debt of 15 round numbers, and hundreds of thousand dollars, the ratepayers will have to see clearly that hydro is going to be a paying proposition before they would vote any more bonded debt on the town.—Chesley Enterprise.

CASTORIA

This is the time of the year when business men generally feel the pinch of financial depression. If you owe an account try and settle it. Many good business concerns have their credit hazarded because of the many who could pay if they would. Let every man meet his obligations promptly.

Toronto's new Carnegie library building is completed and occupied. The building cost $110,000 and is one of the finest in this part of Ontario. What Paisley needs is a public building of that kind. Possibly the library board and council could manage to put a scheme through this year.

That Weak Back

accompanied by pain here or there—extreme nervousness—sleeplessness—may be faint spells—or anaemia—all are signals of distress for a woman. She may be growing from girlhood into womanhood—passing from womanhood to motherhood—or later suffering from that change into middle life which leaves so many wrecks of women. At any or all of these periods of a woman's life she should take a tonic and nervine prescribed for just such cases by a physician of vast experience in the diseases of women.

DR. PIERCE'S

has successfully treated more cases in past forty years than any other known remedy. It can now be had in sugar-coated, tablet form as well as in the liquid. Sold by medicine dealers or treat box by mail on receipt of 50 cents in stamps.

Miss Elizabeth Lawfield of Berkeley, Cal., in a recent letter to Dr. Pierce said: "I was completely broken down in health, I was aching and had pains all over my body and was so nervous that I could scarcely sit anyone talked to me, but I had the good fortune to meet a nurse who had been cured by Dr. Pierce's Prescription. I have never had an occasion to consult a physician since—am in excellent health."

Glazed Earthenware.

Glazed earthenware was long supposed to be of no more ancient date than the ninth century, but the discovery of glazed ware in Egypt, of glazed bricks in the ruins of Babylon, of glazed coffins and enamelled tiles in other ancient cities ignores that idea in toto at once. The Arabs seem to be entitled to the credit of having introduced glazed ware into modern Europe. The Italians are said to have become acquainted with this kind of ware as it was manufactured in the island of Majorca and gave it the name of majolica. The French derived their first knowledge from the Italian manufactory at Faenza and christened it faïence.—London Saturday Review.

Liszt's Rude Host.

High society has its crude personalities. If a story in one of the magazines is true. At a dinner given in the famous pianist, Liszt his host, Count Laduf, right in the middle of Liszt's most exquisite playing, said in a loud voice, "If any one wishes to have a game of whist there are tables in the other room." Liszt rose the narrator, stopped short, but as no one moved he consented audibly to remain at the piano. The amount of wine that had been consumed by Liszt's host on this occasion is not stated.

To Test Bread Dough.

To test light bread dough and make sure as to whether it has risen sufficiently for baking, press the finger in the dough. If the hole remains the dough is in proper condition. If the dough rises and fills the indentation this shows that it is in a condition to continue rising.—Exchange.

If It Must Be.

After a thorough examination, the physician remarked:

"What you need, my dear sir, is an operation."

"Very well," replied the patient resignedly. "Which operation are you cleverest at?"—New York Post.

Sarcastic.

Dr. Pillem—My dear, sir, it is a miracle that you are alive today. Patient—Yes, that's what my friends said when I told them you were attending me.—Life.

THE GREATEST WAR ARENA

BELGIUM'S PLAINS ARE RED WITH BLOOD.

Nearly Every Great Commander Has Fought on Her Soil.

As far back as history reads Belgium has been the battling-ground of the races. Before the dawn of authentic history the legends of that land tell of battling between the tribes of antiquity. Quarternary man, too, probably battled there for the supremacy. There is no doubt but the Celtic peoples coming into Western Europe fought on the plains of Belgium with those who preceded them.

The first battle of the Aisne was fought 1,000 years ago. The Aisne river is a short distance south of the present boundary of Belgium, but it formed the original southern boundary, and it was across the Aisne that Julius Caesar had to cross to subdue the Belgians.

In writing about the battles with them Caesar said: "The bravest of the Gauls are the Belgians." Only after a terrific fight was Caesar able to conquer these fierce people. Caesar's main reason for fighting the Belgians was to get at the Germans. Running south from the Swiss Alps is a long range of mountains and hills extending into the plains of Belgium. These hills are fine places for defending armies to entrench themselves. Only by passing to the north of the hills can an invading army meet the defenders on equal terms.

Densely Populated.

In spite of the frequent invasions Belgium is the most densely populated country in the world. Its population is almost 8,000,000 people. Crowded in such a small space the people, naturally cannot make a living from the land. The living is made chiefly in manufacture and trade with other countries.

In the earlier days Belgium was overrun by the migrating Teutonic tribes. The Vandals, Franks and other tribes of German peoples forcing their way into Western Europe, fought on the plains of Belgium for a passage. They usually crossed the land. The Vikings descended from Denmark, Norway and Sweden and for several hundred years ravaged the coasts. They crossed Belgium to get at the people farther inland. In all that time Belgium was known by various names and owed allegiance to various kings. It has been united with the Netherlands. It has been part of France. The Austrian and Spanish kings ruled over it. It was part of Caesar's empire and a part of the Holy Roman empire. For a time its princes paid fealty to the Danes but throughout all its history the Belgian people maintained their individuality in customs and language. Above all else they have maintained their reputation for bravery and love of freedom. Many of the cities of the land have been sacked repeatedly.

Take, for instance, the city of Maastricht. In the 300 years between the year 900 and 1,100 it was besieged, taken and plundered six times. In the war with Spain, which lasted fifteen years, it was taken by the Spaniards, the Prince of Orange, Prince Maurice, Frederick Henry and sacked every time. It was besieged four times in the wars between Louis XIV. and William III., and in the Napoleonic wars. Again it was taken during the revolution of 1830.

Maastricht's Many Sieges.

That makes fifteen sieges and captures for Maastricht. The worst siege probably was in 1579, when it was captured after a siege lasting 3½ months. The captors pillaged the city and butchered the inhabitants. Only 400 persons survived of a city of 31,000 population.

Brussels also has a career of destructions. The destruction caused by the movement of German troops is not nearly as serious as the destruction caused by the movement of other troops. Brussels was besieged in 1695 by the French. In 1706 it surrendered to the Duke of Marlborough. Forty years later the French besieged it.

It has been said that no great general in the history of the world, with the exception of Hannibal and Alexander the Great, missed fighting a battle on Belgian soil. Napoleon fought the final battle there. That was the greatest battle ever fought on Belgian soil unless some battles of this present war have exceeded it. The numbers then were small compared with the numbers engaged in the present conflict, but the Battle of Waterloo was of more significance because it ruined Napoleon and forever settled his career as the chief ruler of Europe. Napoleon's army in that battle numbered 122,400 men. Wellington's army numbered 105,900 men. Wellington's army consisted of Englishmen, Hanoverians, Brunswickers, Nassauers, Germans and Dutch. Blucher had 116,697 Prussians. Although outnumbered almost two to one, Napoleon entered the fight with confidence. He attacked Blucher at Ligny and forced him to fall back.

The streets of Ligny were filled with dead and dying. Blucher reformed near Waterloo and Wellington came up to bear the brunt of the conflict. Napoleon's method of fighting was to divide an army and defeat the divisions in detail.

Blucher's Masterly Retreat

saved his army from annihilation. Napoleon was unable to follow up his pursuit of Blucher because Wellington was advancing and threatened his flank. He had to fight Wellington first. If he could have defeated Wellington on that memorable day 100 years ago next June 18th, he could then have turned his full force on Blucher. Wellington had the advantage of receiving Napoleon's attack. He did not have to win a victory in a hurry. Delay was in his favor because it would give time for Blucher to reform and come up. Napoleon had to win a decisive victory quickly. Hurling his force against Wellington he pushed the fight, but Blucher came to the rescue. The tide turned against Napoleon and he fled to Paris, leaving his dead and wounded on the field to be cared for by the hospitable Belgians.

That Belgium and Holland are separate countries is due probably to the fact that Spain once forced her rulership over the land. The countries are very closely related and there are no natural boundaries between them.

The Netherlands, of which Belgium was a part, permitted the Spanish to rule over them until Philip II became king of Spain. The people of Antwerp, Amsterdam and other seaports objected to his interference with trade. They were even then a great commercial people. War broke out. Holland, now called the Netherlands, was more successful in resisting the Duke of Alva, Spain's chief general. William of Orange cut the dykes and flooded the Duke of Alva out of the lowlands, but the Spanish were more successful in the highlands. Although the Belgian part of the Netherlands gained its freedom, it took longer. In the meantime, the people living under the Spanish influence became Catholic in religion, while the Hollanders were for the most part Protestants. In these days Protestants and Catholics can live in harmony together, but 100 years ago the thing was impossible.

Demanded Independence.

Napoleon annexed Belgium to France. It remained a part of France until Napoleon's downfall, when the kings of Europe united it with Holland. The Belgians were restive under Dutch rule. Differences in religion were the chief cause of dissention. In 1830, when Europe suffered from rebellion after rebellion, the Belgians also demanded independence.

Placards with red letters were secretly posted one night on the street corners of Brussels defining the following programme: "Monday, fireworks; Tuesday, illuminations; Wednesday, revolution." The revolution came to pass as scheduled. The biggest fight of that war was in Brussels itself. The Belgians were led by a wooden-legged general from Liege. His name was Charlier. He is one of the national heroes of Belgium. Charlier had the women make dummies of straw. These dummies were shoved upon the breastworks and the Dutch would open fire. The dummies would fall behind the breastworks to be shoved up again. The Dutch wasted their ammunition and at the decisive time the Belgians rushed to the attack.

Four days the Belgians and Dutch fought in the streets. The streets were filled with the dead and wounded before the Dutch were finally driven out. Belgium named her own king, and since that time has been exceedingly jealous of her independence. Belgium has been at peace with the world, except with a few small uprisings, until the present war.

By industry and skill the Belgians have built up

A Country of Great Wealth.

They are a manufacturing people and their factories turn out products for sale in all lands. What farming is done is done intensively. The farmers have only a few acres and these acres are made to yield abundantly. Fertilization is carried on with the greatest care. Belgium owns the most fertile lands in Africa. The Congo State pays tribute to Belgium.

Under the reign of Leopold the Congo was cruelly governed. It was exploited for Leopold's private gain. The stories of his cruelty in the Congo astounded the world. Since his death the Congo has been governed with much more consideration.

The greatest horrors of this present war in Belgium are due more to the shutdown of the factories than the horrors of war itself. While many cities have been damaged, and while many cities have been forced to pay tribute to the Germans, yet lack of employment is at the bottom of the greatest distress.

With the factories and shipyards idle the commerce Belgium had with the world is at a standstill. Because their agricultural lands are small and the German soldiers have eaten their food the people are starving. The atrocities against the Belgians by German soldiers have been exaggerated, but the suffering because of lack of employment that has not been exaggerated one bit.

Belgian refugees have thronged Holland, France and England. Yet there are more men left in Belgium who cannot get away.

ADMIRAL JELLICOE'S MEDAL.

Sir John Jellicoe, who leaped into fame when at the beginning of the war he was given supreme command of the English fleets in the North Sea, entered the navy in 1872, when he was thirteen years of age. Ten years later, he carried off the £50 prize for gunnery at the Royal Naval College at Greenwich. Shortly after that feat, which is the more noteworthy because he has been instrumental in improving the marksmanship of the fleet by nearly thirty per cent., he was appointed a junior staff officer of a vessel under command of Captain—now Lord—Fisher; and in 1900, when serving in the Monarch, he was awarded the Board of Trade silver medal for gallantry in saving life at sea. The story is told in Tit-Bits:

The incident occurred near Gibraltar. The crew of a steamer had been stranded on a sand bank, and the seas were running so furiously that it looked as if the shipwrecked mariners might be washed away at any moment. Young Jellicoe, despite the imminent peril, volunteered to man a gig and set out over the raging waters to see if he could effect a rescue.

But the storm was too great. The boat could not live in the seething sea, and soon capsized. Fortunately, the crew were all provided with cork jackets, and, buoyed up by these, they managed to keep alive until they were washed ashore. That is how Jellicoe won his silver medal. Jellicoe was reckless exciting.

In June, 1901, he was promoted commander, and appointed to the Victoria, flagship of Sir George Tryon, in the Mediterranean, and he was in that ship when she sank off Tripoli, having been rammed by the Camperdown.

When the fatal manœuvre took place, he was on the sick list, owing to an attack of Malta fever, and his first intimation of the catastrophe came when he felt the ships come into collision. The Victoria at once took a decided list.

He leaped out of his berth and hurried on deck in his pajamas. Here he met two junior officers, who were hastening below in order to secure some of their belongings. But with half an eye Jellicoe saw that such a course might prove fatal for them.

"Come to the upper deck with me," he advised; and the officers, realizing that they were beside a man who knew how to keep his head, instantly obeyed.

Only just in time however. A few moments later the Victoria began to heel over, and all three were pitched into the sea. One of the two was killed by the propeller, but the other, although injured in his fall, was picked up with Commander Jellicoe.

Twenty-one officers and nearly 350 men in all were drowned in that collision.

When the Victoria went down, "J. J.'s" Board of Trade silver medal went down with it; and, unlike its recipient, it did not come up again. As soon as possible he notified the Board of Trade of his loss, and asked them if he could have another medal to replace the one he had lost; to which request the Board politely replied that he could certainly have another—if he cared to pay for it.

Battles of the 19th Century.

During the nineteenth century 586 battles were fought. This is excluding all the smaller engagements, which, if reckoned along with the rest, bring the total up to 6,109—that is, 61 battles per year, or a fraction over one and a half every week during the full hundred years. British battle-grounds were spread over the following nineteen countries:—France, India, Austria, Russia, Belgium, Egypt, America, Ashanti, Soudan, Afghanistan, China, New Zealand, Zululand, Persia, Abyssinia, Burmah, Matabonaland, Corea and the Transvaal.

LORD ALVERSTONE.

Former Chief Justice of England Loves a Good Story.

To his never-failing kindness, geniality and consideration for others, as much as to the great legal knowledge which placed him on the pinnacle of his profession, Lord Alverstone, the former Lord Chief Justice of England, owes that affectionate admiration with which he is regarded by everyone with whom he has come into contact, and by those who have followed his career, which, in many ways, has been unique.

Many a young barrister, struggling to gain a footing has had cause to bless the name of "Dick" Webster, and many a legal gathering has chuckled with delight over the stories he has related. For Lord Alverstone loves a good story, and tells it with all the more zest when it is against himself.

A short time ago, when speaking of the portrait of himself painted by the Hon. John Collier, his Lordship remarked that the pleasure of being painted by such a distinguished artist was not without its alloy. "The other day, he continued, "a friend came in looking at this portrait, and he then think you could like to be as wise as Collier has made you look?" "I should," I replied. "Well, you can't," said the friend."

The Spinster's Rebuke.

There is another story, too, which Lord Alverstone tells against himself, apropos of his fondness for singing. On one occasion when, as Sir Richard Webster, he addressed a political meeting, he concluded by singing to the audience. His solo, a sacred one, was heard with even more attention than his speech. At the close a gaunt spinster arose at the back of the audience and said: "With your face and your voice, Sir Richard, you ought to be preaching the Gospel truth to the poor heathens instead of telling honest folk to be political."

As late as 1913 Lord Alverstone tells us, in his "Recollections of Bar and Bench," he was a member of the Kensington Parish Church choir, which he first joined 40 years ago, and he is still a member of the Abbey Glee Club, which first knew him in 1867. And in Lord Alverstone's opinion the part-singing given at the meetings of the Abbey Glee Club, held on the second Guesday of every month during ten months of the year, is quite the best that can be heard in London.

In his college days—half a century ago—he came out as a long-distance runner at Cambridge, and won the mile and two miles against Oxford in 1865. Lord Alverstone confesses that he did not work very well in those days, being more devoted to sport than to study, and racquets, sculling, running and cricket found in him an ardent devotee. It is to Lord Alverstone and his friends, Percy M. Thornton and the late C. B. Lucas, that the University of Cambridge owes its Athletic Club of to-day, which, up to 1865, had not been organized in any way.

Is an Early Riser.

Thorough in his profession as well as in sport, there is no doubt that Lord Alverstone owes much of his success to his indefatigableness and custom of rising early. He has always been a firm believer in the maxim that an hour in the morning is worth four of five at night, and he thinks a barrister can best do his preparatory work before breakfast.

Lord Alverstone pays a tribute to the genius, wit and humor of Sir Frank Lockwood, "one of my most intimate friends." A new story concerns an occasion when the respondent in a certain divorce case was charged with cruelty to his wife, who alleged that he had thrown a heavily-bound book at her, which had cut her head open. Sir Henry James, to whom Sir Frank was acting as junior at the time, asked the respondent what explanation he could give of the incident. "Well, Sir Henry," he replied, "all that I can say is that we had a few words, and I was turning over the leaves of a book, when it flew out of my hand."

Many stories have been told about barristers' clerks, but the following is one which Lord Alverstone does not remember to have seen quoted. Lord Herschell, then Mr. Herschell, had a clerk who was a great character. In the year in which Mr. Justice Willies died Herschell came back at the end of the Long Vacation, and asked his clerk what was going on. The clerk said, "Nothing particular." "Well," said Herschell, "but haven't they been asking you anything?" "Oh, yes," he said; "they have asked me whether we're going to take a puisne judgeship." "What did you reply?" said Herschell. "I said, 'Thank God we haven't fallen as low as that!'"

HISTORIC NANCY.

The City Is Beautifully and Spaciously Planned.

The city of Nancy, which is constantly mentioned in the dispatches from the region along the upper Meuse is one of the most interesting provincial towns of France. It was long the capital of the duchy of Lorraine, which began as a kingdom that stretched from the North Sea to the Alps, and in part, at least, maintained its independence from the days of Charlemagne down almost to the time of the French Revolution.

Belgium and Holland, Luxemburg, Alsace, and parts of Switzerland and Burgundy were originally parts of the Kingdom of Lorraine, or Lotharingia, as it was called in the ninth century when Lothair, the great grandson of Charlemagne, inherited it. Little by little its territory diminished through the endless wars and dynastic marriages of the Middle Ages. Part of the time it was a member of the Holy Roman Empire; part of the time it was a fief of France; most of the time it was self governing. Godfrey of Bouillon was one of its dukes. Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, tried to add it to his domains, and failed. He fell in battle under the very walls of Nancy. The dukes of Guise, who disputed with the house of Valois the throne of France, were once rulers in Lorraine. Duke Francis of Lorraine married the Empress Maria Theresa, and his heirs male sit on the throne of Austria-Hungary to day; but he had to give up Lorraine to Stanislas, ex king of Poland, as part of the bargain. Stanislas's daughter Maria was the wife of Louis XV., and when Stanislas died in 1766 the duchy became part of France. Half of it, including the stronghold of Metz, Germany took after the War of 1870. The rest, including Nancy, is still French.

Few provincial capitals are so beautifully and spaciously planned as Nancy. The Place Stanislas is a splendid square, worthy of a much greater city, and it communicates through the fine arch of triumph erected in honor of Louis XV. with the Place Carriere, hardly less impressive. There are some fine old churches, especially the Church of the Cordeliers, built by old Duke Rene in 1482 to commemorate his victory over Charles of Burgundy, and the cathedral, which is copied from the church of Santa Andrea della Valle in Rome. There is the ducal palace, too, a handsome building erected in the fifteenth century.

Nancy has seen its share of war. It was besieged again and again during the Middle Ages, and Sedan, Gravelotte and Rezonville, famous fields of the War of 1870, are near by. But it is no longer a fortified town; and since Verdun, a little to the west, is the strategic point of the region, it is likely this year, as in 1870, to bear the brunt of the fighting, while Nancy goes comparatively free.

PLANTING PEARLS.

A Company Is Experimenting in the Indian Ocean.

Many attempts have been made to encourage oysters to produce pearls. The Chinese have done so with a certain degree of success by dropping fragments of nacre into mussel shells. In time, these fragments are covered with pearly matter, and are attractive enough to be in considerable demand.

According to one authority, a company began scientific experiments in the Indian Ocean not many years ago. They put little balls of nacre, weighing from forty to fifty grains, between the shells of a particularly large species of oyster, known as the American type. After about ten months, these pellets are covered with a beautiful layer of pearly matter, and look exactly like true pearls. When these pearls come upon the market, they will no doubt have a ready sale.

Some of the experiments made by the company came to nothing, and for a curious reason. The cases in which they kept the oysters were bound with iron wire. The shells became impregnated with this iron, and the color of the pearls was seriously damaged. Since then, nickeled wires are used, and the success of the company's enterprise seems assured.

If ignorance were bliss most of us would be so happy we should choke.

An Irish editor says he sees no earthly reason why women should not be allowed to become medical men.

A "BLUE BOOK."

Annual Report of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association.

A great deal has appeared in the press of late regarding "White Papers," "Orange Papers," "Grey Papers," and Papers of other unsuspected colors. They have formed the basis for editorials, speeches and pamphlets, almost without end. We were beginning to look askance on books of any color, however unoffending. This time, a publication, equally innocently garbed—a "Blue Book"—claims attention. Let us at once reassure the reader: it has nothing in common with any of those referred to. It is the tenth annual Report of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association at Ottawa. Whatever its color may be, its contents are varied and interesting. To those who either have not had the time or, perhaps, the opportunity to acquaint themselves with it, a summary may be of value.

It should be explained at the outset that the Association's object is to promote the use of, and to supply farmers with, high-class seed,—seed that is well bred, carefully selected and free from impurity. On such seed the Association sets its seal, and its seal is a guarantee that the seed supplied by its members measures up to the set standard; that it is the best produced in Canada.

Most farmers will admit the advisability of using seed that is of high quality, free from weeds, and unmixed with other varieties. They will recognize the desirability of growing only those varieties that are suited to conditions of soil and climate, but not all will fully realize the extent to which these things affect the yields of their crops, and consequently the returns received from them.

The value of Registered Seed is becoming more and more recognized with each succeeding season. I never had such a growing of crops; I am sure the seed I had a lot to do with it," one grower writes. Another states, "I could never have believed the difference selected seed makes: my Marquis wheat yielded nearly 50 bushels per acre." Another: "I never had such a crop—potatoes—in my life. One short row planted with whole potatoes of Registered stock yielded 9 bushels."

In order to place buyer and grower in touch with each other, the Association issues a catalogue early in each winter containing the names of those who are offering registered seed for sale, together with the sorts offered and the price asked.

The organization of seed centres is a new development. The idea is to secure sources from which seed of a particular variety may be supplied in commercial quantities, and at reduced cost for freight. Instead of the supply being limited to the output of one grower, a number of farmers living near each other may combine to grow a variety for seed under the regulations of the Association. Here is an illustration:

Crop yields, declares L. S. Klinck, formerly Professor of Cereal Husbandry at the Macdonald College, discussing crop management in relation to yield and quality in seed, are determined by the amount of available plant food in the soil, by textural and moisture conditions, and by the character and quality of the seed sown. Good soil management has more influence upon the yield than upon the quality, and the factors influencing quality are less perfectly known.

How to produce larger crops and increase the net profit per acre without depleting the soil of its fertility is the pressing problem. In addition to good soil management, it is necessary that a systematic rotation be followed, that the product of the fields be consumed by live stock, and that the residue be returned to the land.

In general practice, the rotation should furnish a money crop, a hoed or cleaning crop, a live-stock crop, and a legume crop. All cereals are soil exhausters; all legumes are soil enrichers. Cereals produce larger crops when they follow a legume, such as peas, beans or clover. Therefore the cultivation of clover, and closely allied species, must have a place in any successful system.

In all classes of small grains, with the exception of peas, the largest average yield has been obtained from the earliest seeding practicable.

Moisture, not fertility, is usually the determining factor governing the rate of seeding. Failure to secure good crops, and especially the inability to maintain a satisfactory stand of grass and clover seed, is too frequently attributed to lack of fertility, when as a matter of fact, the supply of moisture is inadequate.

The report of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association also contains useful papers on alfalfa, rural school clubs, and other topics.

Paper for Warmth.

In 1870 the French army kept themselves warm during the winter campaign by padding their uniforms with newspapers. Even to-day the Japanese soldiers on active service wear paper shirts. These facts lead French scientists to recommend that the army be supplied with paper undergarments.

It takes a capable wife to yank the conceit out of a man.

DISEASE IS DUE TO BAD BLOOD

To Cure Common Ailments the Blood Must be Made Rich and Red.

Nearly all the diseases that afflict humanity are caused by bad blood—weak, watery blood—poisoned by impurities. Bad blood is the cause of headaches and backaches, lumbago and rheumatism; debility and indigestion, neuralgia and other nerve troubles, and disfiguring skin diseases like eczema and salt rheum show how impure the blood actually is. No use trying a different remedy for each disease, because they all spring from the one cause—bad blood. To cure any of these troubles you must get right down to the root of the trouble in the blood, and that is just what Dr. Williams' Pink Pills do. They make new, rich blood and thus cure these diseases when common medicine fails. Mrs. John Jackson, Woodstock, Ont., suffered from both nervous troubles and a run-down condition and experienced a complete cure through the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. She says: "I was a sufferer for a number of years from neuralgia, and a general debility of the nerves and system. I had tried several doctors and many medicines, but to no avail until I began Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. At the time I began the Pills I had grown so bad that I could hardly be on my feet, and was forced to wear elastic bandages about the ankles. The pain in my head at times from the neuralgia was terrible. I had almost given up hope when I began the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. In the course of a few weeks I felt an improvement, and I soon continued the use of the Pills until I was once more quite well and able to attend to all my household duties."

If you are ailing begin to cure yourself to-day with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. Sold by all medicine dealers or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50, from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

THE MACHINE GUN.

Description of the One Used By the French Army.

The machine gun, which pours forth a direct hail of small calibre bullets, is one of the deadliest weapons of modern warfare. From the clumsy Gatling gun has come the modern "automatic," mounted on a light tripod, and weighing less than forty pounds. All the armies use the guns, which, although they vary somewhat in type, are essentially alike in their mechanism and in their effectiveness. In the Benet-Mercie automatic machine gun of the French army, a metal feed strip, or clip, that contains thirty ordinary army rifle cartridges is inserted in slot on the right side of the gun. As the trigger is pulled the bolt mechanism is released, and, guided by the main firing spring, pushes a cartridge into the rifle chamber. The instant the cartridge is in place the breech mechanism locks and the charge is exploded. On its way through the rifle barrel, a little of the gas from the exploded powder is diverted through a hole in the side of the barrel, and so acts on a piston as to force the bolt mechanism back and to compress the main spring. In returning, the bolt mechanism pulls the empty shell from the chamber and throws it out below, so that it does not interfere with the new cartridge that is now forced in from above. The mechanism is so perfect that the operation described takes place in a small fraction of a second, and the bullets issue from the muzzle of this deadly weapon at the rate of seven hundred a minute.

A MOTHER'S PRAISE OF BABY'S OWN TABLETS

Mrs. Fred Tinkham, South Canaan, N.S., writes:—"Please send me another box of Baby's Own Tablets as I do not care to be without them. I have used them repeatedly and consider them the best medicine in the world for little ones." Thousands of other mothers say the same thing. The tablets cure all the minor ills of childhood such as constipation, sour stomach, colic, colds, simple fever, etc., and are guaranteed to be absolutely safe. Sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Inclined to be Stingy.

Phelim O'Rourke had been married only a week when he discovered that his wife was inclined to be stingy in regard to the larder. He had been working in his small garden one afternoon when Mollie came to the back door and called out in strident tones, "Phelim, come in to tay, toast, and foive eggs." Phelim dropped his spade in astonishment, and ran into the kitchen. "Sure, Mollie, ye're only tazing me!" he said. "Nay," replied his wife, "it's not ye; it's the neighbors I'm foolin'."

"Why did Ferdy drop out of business with his father?" "Well the old man said he could stand for college flags and posters, but he positively would not have any sofa pillows around the office."

SIR HAMAR GREENWOOD.

New Canadian Baronet Has Had Remarkable Career in England.

Sir Hamar Greenwood comes into his baronetcy not at all unexpectedly, for the British Isles have been the Fortunate Isles for him, without any qualifications. His career in England is looked upon by many Canadians as a sort of miraculous romance, somewhat resembling that of Sir Gilbert Parker.

Sir Hamar was born at Whitby, Ontario, in 1870. He graduated at the Toronto University. He practised law a short time, spent a brief period as a civil servant in the Ontario Department of Agriculture, and then went to England without fortune and without friends; with nothing but a lawyer's degree, a good physique, and plenty of self-confidence and ability. The following story throws light on both Sir Hamar's temperament and position shortly after arriving in England. It is related that on one occasion when he was lecturing on temperance (his first occupation in the Old Country) he was a guest at a magnificent country house in an English village in which he was to speak. In the morning a valet entered the guest chamber and proceeded to arrange the guest's apparel. Out of a trouser's pocket dropped a two-and-sixpence, which was at the moment the entire liquid capital of the coming statesman. After a time the guest opened his eyes. The valet, who no doubt had his own impressions about the meagre contents of the guest's pockets, remarked: "The two-and-sixpence which fell out of your pocket I have laid on the table, sir." Greenwood quickly replied: "Oh, that is for you, my man. I left it in that pocket for you in case I did not wake up."

Political Career.

The first success of the aggressive young Canadian was to run for the British Parliament as a Liberal in Lt.-Col. Sir Hamar Greenwood.

York, a stronghold of Conservatism, and win a seat. Once in the limelight, he stayed there. He won powerful friends, notably Right Hon. Winston Churchill, now First Lord of the Admiralty, for whom he was for some time Parliamentary Private Secretary.

Mr. Greenwood made powerful connections in the law as well as in politics, and now has a large and lucrative practice in London. In 1911 he married Miss Margery Spencer, of Townhope Court, Herefordshire, England, whom he met at Kingston, Jamaica, at a lunch during which the first shock of the great earthquake was felt. His wife is the daughter of a wealthy landowner.

Sir Hamar is a strong Home Ruler, and on one of his more or less recent visits to Toronto he told the Canadian Club that the Dominion ought to do her full share towards the defence of the Empire. He is at present member of Parliament for Sunderland, Eng., having been elected for that constituency in 1910. He has made himself prominent in the same way that Theodore Roosevelt, Sam Hughes, and many others have carved riches for themselves. This is not to say that he is vain or that he talks too much—but simply that he is best described as "a force."

The Scene Was Funny.

Paddy has a great power of enjoyment after all. One day as he was walking he saw a bull attack a man, and he had to hold his sides with both hands, the scene was so funny. After a time the animal turned his attention to him, and poor Pat, after exploring the upper regions, came down with a bump on the other side of the fence. He rubbed his wounds as he said to himself—"Faith, I'm glad I had my laugh when I did or I wouldn't have had it at all."

Willis—We thought our bank cashier was a good business man because he was always talking about making the funds go as far as possible. Gillis—Did he do it? Willis—Yes; the last trace the detectives got of him he was in South America.

Magical Effect on Neuralgia Throbbing Pain Goes Quickly

A YEAR'S SUFFERER CURED BY "NERVILINE."

No person reading this need ever again suffer long from Neuralgia.

Nerviline will quickly cure the worst Neuralgia, and Mrs. G. Evans, in her strong letter written from Russel post office, says:—"One long year, the longest of my life, was almost entirely given up to treating dreadful attacks of Neuralgia. The agony I experienced during some of the bad attacks was simply unmentionable. To use remedies by the score without permanent relief was mighty discouraging. At last I put my faith in Nerviline; I read of the wonderful pain subduing power it possessed and made up my mind to prove it valuable or useless. Nerviline at once eased the pain and cured the headache. Continuous treatment with this magic working remedy cured me entirely and I have ever since stayed well."

Mrs. Evan's case is but one of hundreds that might be quoted. Nerviline is a specific for all nerve, muscular or joint pain. It quickly cures neuralgia, sciatica, lumbago, lame back, neuritis and rheumatism. Forty years in use, and to-day the most widely used liniment in the Dominion. Don't take anything but "Nerviline," which any dealer anywhere can supply in large 50c. family size bottles, or in a small 25c. trial size.

TWO MARVELLOUS BOYS.

Young Hindoos Solve Complex Problems Instantly.

There is at the present time studying at Cambridge one of the most wonderful mathematicians the world has seen—a young Hindoo, Mr. S. Ramanujan by name—whose work, although he is only twenty-six years of age, says London Tit Bits, has excited the admiration of all mathematical experts. Perhaps the most extraordinary thing about Ramanujan is that as a mathematician he is quite untaught.

Until a year ago he was a clerk in the employment of the Port Trust, of Madras.

But in spite of this, he has, to quote Mr. Hardy, Fellow of Trinity, who has taken a great interest in Ramanujan, "discovered for himself a great number of things which the leading mathematicians of the last hundred years had added to the knowledge of second men, although he was quite ignorant of their work and accomplishments. Indeed, his mathematical education is rather a mystery, and the first I knew of him was about fifteen months ago when he wrote to me explaining who he was, and sent a large number of remarkable mathematical theorems, which he had proved."

This is the second mathematical genius produced by India in the last three years. At the end of 1912 the members of the Royal Asiatic Society held a specially convened meeting at Colombo, when they were astonished by the arithmetical powers of a Tamil boy, Arumogan. A complicated series of sums had been prepared to test the boy's powers, each of which he answered within a few seconds. One sum was: "A chetty gave as a treat to 173 persons a bushel of rice each. Each bushel contained 3,551,272 grains, and the chetty stipulated that seventeen per cent. should be given to the temple. How many grains did the temple get?" Within three seconds came the answer (which had to be translated), 10,013,209, with fifty-two as the fraction over.

SOUND SLEEP

After Change to Postum.

"I have been a coffee drinker, more or less, ever since I can remember, until a few months ago I became more and more nervous and irritable, and finally I could not sleep at night for I was horribly disturbed by dreams of all sorts and a species of distressing night mare." (The effects on the system of tea and coffee drinking are very similar, because they each contain the drug, caffeine.)

"Finally, after hearing the experience of numbers of friends who had quit coffee and were drinking Postum, and learning of the great benefits they had derived, I concluded coffee must be the cause of my trouble, so I got some Postum and had it made strictly according to directions.

"I was astonished at the flavour and taste. It entirely took the place of coffee and to my very great satisfaction, I began to sleep peacefully and sweetly. My nerves improved, and I wish I could wean every man, woman and child from the unwholesome drug-drink—coffee.

"People do not really appreciate or realize what a powerful drug it is and what a terrible effect it has on the human system. If they did, hardly a pound of coffee would be sold. I would never think of going back to coffee again. I would almost as soon think of putting my hand in a fire after I had once been burned. Yours for health."

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum — must be well boiled. 15c. and 25c. packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

MY FIRST KISS.

From a Gallant London Scottish Soldier.

My first kiss! Alas, it was given me but a few weeks ago, and already it seems an age. It happened thus:—I was down in London visiting some relatives. There I met a nice young fellow who was serving in the ranks of the gallant London Scottish. We met frequently, and he showed me most of the London sights. Our friendship ripened quickly.

Then like a thunderbolt came the order for the regiment to go, no one knew whither. All at once the war became a personal affair to myself. As a favor I was permitted to see the troops entraining. A few minutes were given to the men to take farewell of their friends. We seized the precious moments. In a semi-private corner of the station we said good-bye. Not much was said, for we understood the feelings of each other too well for that. There in that little Paradise, and in the gathering gloom I got my first kiss, and a minute or two later I was waving my farewell to him in the departing train.

The next few weeks were spent in anxiously scanning the papers. Then came word that my friend had been killed in the gallant and ever memorable charge on the trenches of the enemy. I was left alone, with the memory of a kiss!

A good story is going the rounds with reference to the habit of undue familiarity. One of these ill-mannered people called at the British War Office the other day, and in the course of an interview with the War Minister inquired, "What do you think, Kitchener?" Lord Kitchener assumed a sardonic smile and blandly remarked: "Don't be so beatly formal. Call me Herbert."

Camels Like Tobacco.

The camel, which is taking its part in the campaign against Turkey, is not, according to most travellers, a very companionable beast, but he has at least one human weakness—a love of tobacco. One of the methods used by Arabs in taming wild camels is to fix a kind of cigar holder in the animal's mouth and insert a huge loosely-rolled cigar. As soon as the camel starts to draw, it becomes remarkably docile, and quickly learns to inhale in the smoke and emit it through the nostrils. The one drawback of the system is that the knowand refuses to budge without his cigar.

Will Quickly Cure Any Sour Stomach

Relieves Fullness After Meals

"When I was working around the farm last winter, I had an attack of indigestion," writes Mr. E. P. Hawkins, of Port Richmond. "I was weak for a long time, but well enough to work until spring. But something went wrong with my bowels for I had to use salts or physic all the time. My stomach kept sour, and always after eating there was pain and fulness, and all the symptoms of intestinal indigestion. Nothing helped me until I used Dr. Hamilton's Pills. Instead of hurting, like other pills, they acted very mildly, and seemed to heal the bowels. I did not require large doses to get results with Dr. Hamilton's Pills, and feel so glad that I have found a mild yet certain remedy. To day I am well—no pain, no sour stomach, a good appetite, able to digest anything. This is a whole lot of good for one medicine to do, and I can say Dr. Hamilton's Pills are the best pills, and my letter, I am sure proves it."

Mr J S Isard, of Wingham, made a hurried business trip to our burg one day last week. Owing to the high price of beef the farmers of Elderslie do not seem to be inclined to go in strong for dairying as it requires more labor—something that is sadly lacking on farms nowadays, and as a consequence J S has disposed of the machinery in the cheese factory, and later on the building may also be sold. It is eight years since Jim drove up big Fourth St, and he felt he should just be rolling up his sleeves and getting into the milk vat. However, chances for that seem to be remote at present. Mr Isard always enjoyed the respect of his neighbors and good will of the patrons while he was in business here, and wherever his lot may be cast good wishes from Elderslie follow him.

PINKERTON

At the annual library meeting held on Saturday evening it was felt that in view of the satisfactory state of the finances and the more pressing calls by the various deserving funds, a box social in aid of the library would be rather ill timed. However, as the social and dance is an annual event in the village it was decided to call a meeting on Saturday evening, Jan 30th, to arrange for a social in aid of the Belgians. All who are interested in this important cause should be on hand to arrange details.

We notice by the daily press that the Canadian regiment the Princess Pats are now at the front taking part in the mighty conflict which is being waged throughout Europe. Without a doubt this regiment which is made up of true and trusty veterans will do their share in the bloody strife to crush German militarism. Canada is certainly showing her loyalty to the mother country by giving the pick of her men along with the thousands of dollars received in subscriptions which will help to allay part of the sufferings of the besieged people. The Canadians who are now at the front and those who are following up will show their loyalty by their actions more than by words.

Let colonies be her fen,
But never a race can fill the place
Of our brave Canadian.

Then give us the man, whatever his clan
Or national tongue may be;
We've a land that moulds, a land that holds
Where a man's a man and free.

Where a creature's need has a country's heed,
The coin of the realm is "Do."
The man that gives is the man that lives
A patriot staunch and true.

Presentation to Rev. Mr. Gale and Family

Rev. R N Gale, who on Tuesday was inducted as the new pastor of Pinkerton and Cargill Presbyterian churches, was a resident at Alma prior to his call to this charge. On Friday last his friends presented Mr. and Mrs. Gale with a purse of gold as a recognition of his services as a layman in the congregation at Alma, accompanied by the following address:

Alma, Ont., Jan. 22, 1915

We, the members and adherents of the Presbyterian church, learning of your intended departure, since having been called of God to a new field of labor, we ask you, Mr. and Mrs. Gale, to accept this small token, not for its intrinsic value but for the spirit in which it is given. You have devoted a great part of your lives to the many branches of church work. With your pleasant smiles and Christian influence you have won the respect and esteem of the people. We feel honored to know that Mr. Gale has taken up the last and great command given by Christ to His disciples. To you, Mr. Gale, who labored in the Sabbath School as superintendent for many years, we are greatly indebted for faithful work in striving to mould the lives of so many of our young boys and girls who came under your care in the Sabbath School. We also extend to you thanks for your untiring efforts put forth in training and leading the choir. We all join with the Tribes in thanking Mrs. Gale for her faithful work in the Ladies' Aid Society. We all unite in wishing you every success, and may your lives be crowned with the blessing of God and may your efforts put forth in the Christian service redound to the honor and glory of God. Signed on behalf of the Presbyterian Church.

At the same time the following address was presented to Miss Hattie Gale in acknowledgment and appreciation of the commendable part she has played in the life of the Alma community:

DEAR HATTIE—Knowing that you are soon to leave our circle of young people, we take this opportunity of expressing to you our appreciation of your many little services given so faithfully in Guild, choir and Sabbath school. We ask you to accept this small token of remembrance, not for its value but for the spirit in which it is given, and as you leave us and go with your father to his new field of labor may you never take the same deep interest in doing your little part as you have done here with us. We shall always cherish the friendship existing between us as young people, and though we feel sure that you will make many friends in your new home yet we hope that the old ties will never be broken and that we shall have you often among us. We all unite in wishing for you many blessings and true prosperity to whatever sphere your lot may be cast. Signed on behalf of the young people of the church.

PRESENTATION

The Durham Review gives the following account of an event in that town in which one of the honored persons is a Bruce township girl (nee Miss Christine McGillivray) daughter of Mr and Mrs Colin McGillivray, 12th con:

On Friday evening two neighbors of young people from Durham invaded the home of Mr and Mrs D A Campbell of Garafraxa St, Durham, and gave them a very pleasant evening.

An impromptu program was taken charge of by Rev Mr Mills of Lutton church. Following the chairman's neat address, instrumental and vocal selections were given by the Misses Mortley, Reid, Lawson, Reller, Alexander and Campbell, also by Messrs Morrison Smith, Master Willie Lawson and Durham choir. Recitations were given by Miss Reid and Miss Brook.

The event of the evening was the presentation of a handsome rocker to Mr and Mrs Campbell. Miss Carr, Mortley and Mr George Alexander made the presentation, and Miss Blanche Reid read the following address:

To Mr and Mrs D A Campbell.

We, your friends and neighbors, desirous of expressing our congratulations and well wishes to you on the threshold of your matrimonial life, also knowing and appreciating your many sterling qualities of mind and heart and the important place you have filled in the social life of the community, bespeak for you a happy and useful wedded life and would ask you to accept this chair as a memento of the occasion and a tangible token of our regard.

Signed on behalf of the neighborhood.

Mr Campbell thanked his guests with evident sincerity for their kindness.

It was remarked that the luncheon served by the young ladies was of quality to tempt the Dornoch youth to follow Mr Campbell's example.

After playing games and singing Auld Lang Syne, the young people said good night to the young couple to whom they had brought a very real happiness.

—Our newest clubbing offer is the Daily World from now to 1st July, 1915, for $1.00.

—Mr. A. Cormack, of Paisley, shipped two carloads of cattle from this station last Saturday. These cattle were placed with a number of Carrick farmers last fall, to finish for Mr Cormack, and he was well pleased with the results. They were an extra fine lot of heifers, some of them tipping the scales at 1500 lbs. each.—Wildmay Gazette.

—The recent death of Professor Donald McKinnon of Edinburg University, will be learned of with regret by many people in Bruce, as among the early settlers of this part were quite a number who were relatives, schoolmates or friends of the deceased. The late Mrs. McEachern of Elderslie, who died last year, was a sister.

—The brand of winter that has been handed out by the weather gods this week is the real old stuff—zero temperature, with howling wind and swirling snow. On Monday night the train, which was over 1½ hours late reaching Paisley, got stalled ¾ of a mile past Turner's station and stood there until Tuesday forenoon when it was pulled back, one car at a time, by the snow plow crew that came to the rescue. The snow plow went south again on Tuesday, but the trains will not be through until Wednesday afternoon. The storm seems to have been general over a wide area, but has abated. Countryroads are badly drifted and filled.

—Friends of the soldier boys who are going to the front will be glad to learn that arrangements have been made whereby the ordinary rate of two cents per ounce applicable to all letters sent from Canada to the United Kingdom will apply to all letters addressed to British and Canadian troops on the continent. The rate on ordinary letters from Canada for the continent is five cents for the first ounce, and three cents for each subsequent ounce, so that this extension of the two cent an ounce rate to letters addressed to our soldiers on the continent is a decided reduction in favor of correspondence going to the soldiers.

—Mr. Thos. Patterson, who for many years was a resident of Paisley, passed away at his home in Sault Ste. Marie, Ont., on Jan. 22nd. The deceased had been afflicted with paralysis for three years, and it was a third stroke which ended his life. He was 71 years of age, and it is nearly 50 years since he first lived in this section, coming first with his mother and a brother to a farm in Greenock, but not long after became resident of the village. Mr. Patterson went to the Soo where he found employment, and his family removed there about twelve years ago. He is survived by his wife, four daughters and one son. Mrs. Patterson is a sister of Mrs. H. Reed and the late Mrs. F. Carter of Paisley.

—It's only a dollar, but it means a good deal to THE ADVOCATE if hundreds are slow in paying that on their subscription.

A Cowboy Toreador

Mrs. Foster and her young brother-in-law, Sam, did not hear the sound of running footsteps—or, hearing, did not heed them. A moment later there was a hurried scramble of small feet across the porch, and Johnny Sears, red-faced and breathless, burst in upon them, slamming the screen door behind him.

"O—Mis' Foster! A bull's got teacher and the kids held up in the schoolhouse!" he panted. "Please, ma'am, have Mr. Foster go down and drive him off! They can't get out!"

"Held up—in the schoolhouse! By a bull!" began Mrs. Foster, incomprehendingly.

"Yes'm. A big 'Bar J.' bull," asserted Johnny. "He was there when Miss Kline let out school. Some of the fellers tried to drive him off, but he got mad and druv 'em back inside.' Miss Kline let me out one of the windows at the back—while the other fellers kept the bull watchin' in the front. Then I legged it! I was plumb scarced," said Johnny, without any false bravado.

"I reckon I'll have to go down to the school and help 'em out," said Sam Foster, as he rose from his chair. "I wish I had Rocker here!"

"Take Tom's horse, Sam. Juniper's in the corral, and Tom's saddle's on a peg by the stall!" exclaimed Mrs. Foster, eagerly.

"All right; I'll run him off in no time," replied the young man, and he hurried out toward the back of the house.

Sam Foster was one of the head cowpunchers of the "Circle S" cattle outfit up north of Cochise's stronghold in the Sulphur Springs valley in Arizona. He had come down to Black Diamond that day to have his favorite horse, Rocker, shod by the blacksmith at the mine, who was an expert farrier.

In his brother's corral, Sam quickly threw Tom's saddle on Juniper. "This outfit would last about three days in a round-up," he said to himself, as he drew up the light, cheap cinch straps. "But I reckon it does all right for Tom's riding."

Range cattle are so accustomed to being herded and driven by men on horseback that they almost never make and stand against a mounted man. But bulls are of uncertain temper. This Bar J. bull was a fierce fellow, and the efforts that the teacher and the pupils of the Black Diamond school had made to drive him away had roused all his fighting spirit.

Therefore, when Sam Foster turned out from the road on Juniper, swinging his hat and giving the shrill "Hi-yip!" with which the cowboys "start" the cattle, the bull did not run. He hesitated only a moment, and then, with lowered head and lifted tail, charged straight at the astonished Juniper—and scarcely less astonished rider!

Sam's skill was just sufficient to save the horse from being impaled on the animal's sharp horns. But when Sam tried to swing Juniper again toward the bull, the horse revolted. He had had all he wanted of bull fighting. As Sam's spurs touched his flank once more, he suddenly swelled his body and made a lateral "buck jump" into the air.

The slender, cheap cinch straps gave way with a snap, and Miss Kline and the school children, watching eagerly from the open windows, saw their would-be rescuer fly saddle and all, from Juniper's back, and pile up in a heap on the ground. The frightened horse at once bolted away.

By some good luck, Sam did no serious damage. Although shaken and chagrined, he was able to scramble to his feet before the bull could make another charge. Then he caught sight of a stout mesquite stick that some boy had left on the playground. He caught it up and faced the angry animal as it prepared to charge. As the bull rushed at him, Sam stepped lightly aside, after the manner of a matador in a Spanish bull fight, and delivered two swift blows as the animal passed him, one on the muzzle and one on the flank. The bull bellowed with surprise and anger, shook its head and charged again. Sam set himself to sidestep the bull's rush, and at the same moment deliver a good heavy blow across the brute's eyes. But a loose stone slipped under one of his feet; he swung to one side, but his movement barely carried him out of reach of the sharp horns.

Sam staggered, and his outflung left hand swept against the bristling hairs on the bull's neck. Involuntarily he clutched them, and the animal's momentus swung him against its body just back of the shoulders.

Mounting a horse at full gallop is a well-known trick among the cowboys. A sudden instinct told him that he must swing himself on the bull's back, or go down for a heavy and perhaps disastrous fall. He leaped, and in an instant was fairly astride the bull's back, with the mesquite club still grasped in his right hand. He dug the rowels of his spurs into the bull's side and belabored its flanks with the stick.

The bull seemed dazed by the strange weight on its back, the sting of the spurs, and the pain of the blows. He set out at a lumbering gallop across the mesa, jumping and plunging in terror.

Sam had no difficulty in keeping his seat; the trouble was to dismount. He did not doubt that he could drop off the bull's neck successfully. But would the animal go on—or turn and attack him again? If he stayed on the bull's back, there was every reason to think that the frightened bull would plunge into one of the deep coulees that furrowed the hillside. Such a fall might easily be fatal to both beast and rider.

But in this moment of stress, luck turned Sam Foster's way. A military horseman, riding lazily up from the lower camp, appeared, and took in the situation at a glance. Wheeling his horse from the road, he gave it the spur, and went flying toward the bull. Sam gave an eager gesture for the horseman to close in. The rider came on toward the bull's flank swiftly.

"Keep him going when I drop off!" shouted Sam, and the stranger nodded. Sam grasped the hair of the bull's neck, slipped his leg over the bull's back, and swung himself safely to the earth.

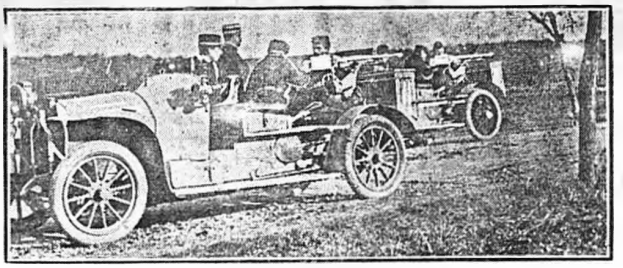
For an instant the bull slackened its pace as if inclined to turn. But the rider whooped shrilly, and came rushing on. The bull's nerve weakened. With a final snort of terror, it quickened its speed, and disappeared from view with a flying plunge down the steep bank of a coulee.

When, a moment later, the pursuing rider pulled up on the brink of the gully, the monarch of Bar J. was galloping wildly down the bottom of the hollow, headed for the freedom of the open plains.

"HEAVING THE LEAD."

Picturesque Process Which Has Not Been Wholly Displaced.

"Heaving the lead" looks easy enough, and anybody who is accustomed to doing it will say that it is quite simple; but it takes a long time before a man becomes a proficient leadsman. A novice is apt to be frightened at the whirling fourteen-pound weight on the end of its line, and if he loses heart and omits to give it that peculiar jerk which brings it flying round in a circle, it may fall perpendicularly in close proximity to his head. Hearing the lead may be all right enough in good weather, but in the winter, when it is blowing hard, raining or snowing, it is anything but pleasant. The driving rain and snow searches out every portion of the leadsman's anatomy, even though he be wearing oilskins, while his hands get numb with cold, until there is no feeling left in them.



The deep-sea leadline, which was invariably used for deep-water work before the introduction of patent sounding machines, and would still be used if they broke down, consists of 100 fathoms of line and a 28-pound lead. It is marked up to 20 fathoms in the same way as the hand leadline, and then at 25, 30, 45, etc., fathoms with one knot and at 30, 40, 50, etc., with three, four, or five knots, and so on, to the greatest depth of the line. The ship is usually stopped when making the deep-sea line, for it takes a considerable time for the lead to reach the bottom.

The patent sounding machine consists of 800 fathoms of thin piano wire wound on a drum, and to the end of the wire is secured a 28-pound lead, with just above it, a perforated brass sheath fitted with a cap. Before sounding takes place a glass tube, open at one end and coated on the inside with a red chemical compound, is placed in the brass sheath. The wire is then allowed to run out until the lead is on the bottom, and as it descends the pressure forces the water up the glass tube and turns the red chemical into a milky-white color for a certain distance up it. The lead is then hauled in by hand, or by a motor, and the depth is ascertained by comparing the line of demarcation between the two colors in the glass tube with a wooden scale marked in fathoms.

With these simple but extremely reliable machines soundings can be obtained at greater depths, and with the ship traveling at far greater speed than with the hand lead and line, though, as already stated, the older method is always held in reserve.

A Gran' Thing for Him.

An amusing story was told in connection with the appointment of the Emperor of Russia as Colonel-in-Chief of the Scots Greys, who, it may be mentioned, fought in the Crimea during the war. After the appointment had been duly promulgated an enthusiastic subaltern of the regiment communicated the information to his soldier servant, "Donald," he said, "have you heard that the Emperor of Russia has been appointed Colonel of the regiment?" "Indeed, sir," said Donald, "it's a verra gran' thing for him." Then, after a pause, he inquired, "Beg pardon, sir, but will he be able to keep baith jobs?"

The Mitrailleuse Auto.

The picture shows the armed car which has been so often mentioned in war cables. These quick-firing and swift-running engines of destruction are something new in this war, and the allies have used them with great effect. The picture shows French cars on a road in Eastern France.

HIS LIFE SEEMS CHARMED.

Miraculous Escapes of a London Scottish Soldier.

The seemingly charmed life of Private Leaske, of the first battalion of the London Scottish, has attracted considerable attention in England, according to letters recently received. Private Leaske has been invalided home with a severe flesh wound in the thigh, and, notwithstanding his desperate experiences, is now reported to be recovering.

When the war began Private Leaske was in business in Antwerp. There he remained until the investment of the city by the Germans, and refused to leave when the bombardment commenced. A German shell destroyed the house in which he lived, and when the fortress fell he beat a hasty retreat to England.

Having served in the London Scottish he re-enlisted in the first battalion, with which he was sent to France later. During an engagement when the regiment was first under fire, three bullets pierced his great coat, but did him no injury. The following day, however, a fourth bullet wounded him in the thigh and he was carried off to a hospital.

It appears that the engagement was in Belgium and that he was taken to a field hospital near Ypres. The Germans shelled the place and Private Leaske was removed with the remainder of the wounded to another hospital farther to the south. This building also the Germans shelled and the young soldier had a very narrow escape from flying fragments of shrapnel before he was carried from the building in safety.

Fortunately his next place of retreat was far beyond the range of the German artillery, distance being a more effectual protection than the Red Cross ensign from German shell fire. There he remained until with several others he was taken to England. It was believed that then he would be left in peace until his wound was healed.

Such was not the case, however, for he was sent to a hospital in Hartlepool. He had not been in the institution 24 hours before the German raiding cruiser squadron opened fire on the city. With unerring accuracy the German guns speedily searched out the hospital which was one of the buildings struck.

Private Leaske then came to the conclusion that he would be much safer on the firing line, and thence forward he made progress toward recovery. He says he will not feel really safe and comfortable until he rejoins his regiment at the front.

FACTS AND FIGURES.

Germany's Economic Position Is Not Sound.

In the early summer of 1912 a German economic specialist, Herr Possell, lectured to the German Defence League on the economic aspects of war in their relation to the Fatherland. The lecture was not published at the time, because the weak points in Germany's position would be made all too clear. It was given access to the light through publicity in Marseilles the other day, and it helps one to realize just where Germany is most in danger of being hardest hit. She requires to import more than 12,000,000 tons of minerals; her ports blockaded, "the whole industry would be strangled." Under the same conditions textile industries "could not live"; in fact, "none of the great German industries could continue to exist if cut off from the sea." If there were a long war, with a consistently maintained blockade, "at least one-third of the workers in German industries would be without bread." The shipping "would be the first to succumb"—as it has succumbed. To feed the people imports of foodstuffs to the extent of 10 per cent. of her needs would be cut off, and "there would be not less than six million to eight million people in Germany in a state of want," who would have to be maintained at a cost of not less than twelve cents per day. These facts and figures speak for themselves. All the conditions foreseen by Herr Possell have been fulfilled, and more than fulfilled, because of the much greater strain on the national resources than the lecturer was counting on.

FAITHFUL WAR HORSES.

Artillery Driver Relates Incidents of Retreat From Mons.

A Welshman, a driver in the Royal Field Artillery, told the following simple story about his horses in the war—

I had driven them for three years I tell you I could talk to them just as I am talking to you. There was not a word I said that they did not understand. And they could answer me—they could, indeed. I was never once at a loss to know what they meant. When I was astride one of them—why, I had only got to think what I wanted him to do he would do it without being told.

Early in the retreat from Mons a shell crashed right into the midst of the section with which I was moving. A driver in front of me was blown to bits. My gun was wrecked. I was ordered to help with another. As I mounted the fresh horse to continue the retreat I saw my two horses struggling and kicking on the ground to free themselves. I could not go back to them I tell you it hurt me.

Suddenly a French chasseur dashed up to them, cut the traces, and set them at liberty. I was a good way ahead by that time, but I kept looking back at them, and I could tell that they saw me directly they were on their feet.

Those horses followed me for four days. We stopped for hardly five minutes and I could not get back to them. There was no work for them, but they kept their places in the line like trained soldiers. They were following me to the very end, and the thought occurred a thousand times, "What do they think of me as another horse?" Whenever I looked there they were in the line, watching me as anxiously and sorrowfully as to make me feel guilty of deserting them. Whenever the word "Halt" ran down the column I held up my hand to them and they saw it every time. They stopped instantly.

Whether they got anything to eat I do not know. I wonder whether they dropped out from sheer exhaustion. I hope to Heaven it was not that. At any rate one morning when the retreat was all over I missed them. I suppose I shall never see them again. That's the sort of thing that hurts a soldier in war.

The Cheerful British Soldier.

A surgeon who has returned from France pays a tribute to the admirable fortitude of the wounded soldiers. He says that nothing could be more admirable than the sang-froid and cheeriness of men and officers alike. Many of them were cold, wet, and hungry, all had more or less pain, some had suffered exceeding'y during their transit from the front, and some were faint from loss of blood, yet no one really grumbled or made querulous complaints. At the most they asked for something to drink, or for some one to move them to a more comfortable position. Many were so tired that in spite of pain they went to sleep on their stretchers.

If some men had their lives to live again they probably wouldn't leave so many dollars for their heirs to scrap over.

WHEN U.S. STARVED OTHERS

LANCASHIRE'S MEMORY OF AMERICAN WAR.

No British Protest When It Caused Famine in Cotton Districts.

The London Express has a hark-back to the history of the war of 1860 to 1864 in America with a vivid application to conditions to-day that is edifying. It says:

The complaint of the President of the U.S. that American trade is suffering because of British interference with American exports in neutral countries of contraband goods destined for Germany is open to the retort that America caused far greater hardship to England by her interference with the English cotton supply during the American Civil War.

At the present time there is no evidence that there is any real suffering in America on account of the efforts of the British Navy to stop contraband goods from crossing the Atlantic but there are thousands of persons in England who remember "the cotton famine" from 1860 to 1901.

A Lancashire Memory.

In Lancashire it is the grimmest memory of those who were children 50 years ago, for the famine of cotton meant a famine of work and its consequences — privation, starvation, the death of old and young for lack of proper food and the breaking up and desolation of homes.

That all arose because the Northern and Southern States felt themselves compelled to fight each other —regardless of the interests of neutrals.

In those days nearly all the raw cotton came from the United States. Lancashire lived on America's raw cotton. When the South began war on the North, the North did not hesitate to try to cripple its enemy by strangling its trade. The Northern navy established a blockade of the Southern ports, and the cotton lay rotting on the quays of Charlestown, while the Lancashire cotton workers were starving for the lack of their raw material.

Blockade Runners' Work.

British traders tried to smuggle goods into the Southern ports and to smuggle cotton out, and for some time the blockade runners made a rich harvest. The goods were first of all carried to and from England and the Bahamas, and were then rushed across the short sea-space between the Bahamas and the Southern ports.

In order to stop this the Northern States captured ships between the Bahamas and England and pleaded that although the cargoes were transhipped at the Bahamas they really made a "continuous voyage" which is the British complaint at the present moment about contraband which America ships to various neutral ports, although every one knows the goods are going to Germany.

In 1863, however, Great Britain recognized that the North had a right to cripple the South's trade, and issued no protest against the terrible injury which the action of the Northern navy inflicted on Lancashire.

It was estimated at the time that the cotton workers of Lancashire lost $60,000,000 a year in wages, and that the total loss to the trade was $200,000,000 a year while the blockade lasted.

Although a fool and his money may be easily separated they are hard to find.

The proprietor of a hotel hearing of the whereabouts of a guest who had decamped from the Palmer House without paying his bill, sent him a note: "Dear Sir,—Will you send the amount of your bill and oblige. To which the delinquent replied: The amount is $8.20. Yours respectfully.

DRY IRRITATING HACK OF BRONCHITIS INSTANTLY RELIEVED BY "CATARRHOZONE"

No Failure. Cure in Every Case Treated by Catarrhozone

Catarrhozone can't fail to cure bronchitis; it's so healing, soothing and balsamic that every trace of the disease dies before it. When you inhale the pure piney vapor of Catarrhozone, you send healing medication to the spots that are diseased and sore.

Isn't it rational to apply medicine where the disease exists? Certainly! and that's why Catarrhozone is so successful; it goes where the trouble really is, gets where a spray of ointment can't penetrate. For the relief and complete cure of bronchitis, asthma, catarrh, throat trouble, we guarantee Catarrhozone in every case. You don't take medicine — you don't take dreamy drugs—just breathe the balsamic essences of Catarrhozone; it does the rest safely and surely.

"For three years I was seriously bothered by a bronchial cough. A night I would awaken with a dry irritable feeling in my throat. I couldn't cough up anything, but very soon coughed my throat into quite an inflamed condition. Once I got Catarrhozone inhaler I was all right. I took it to bed, and if an attack awakened me a few minutes use of the inhaler gave me relief. Catarrhozone has cured me and I strongly urge everyone with a weak throat to use it regularly.

HEALTH WRECKED THROUGH LA GRIPPE

It Generally Leaves the Patient Debilitated and an Easy Victim to Other Diseases

One of the foremost medicine writers says: "It is astonishing the number of people who have been crippled in health for years after an attack of la grippe or influenza." The real danger from this disease, which sweeps over Canada every winter, is during convalescence, when the characteristic symptoms, the fever, the catarrh, the headache and the depression of spirits pass away. Grip leaves behind it weakened vital powers, thin blood, impaired digestion and over-sensitive nerves — a condition that makes the system an easy prey to pneumonia, bronchitis, rheumatism, nervous prostration and even consumption. It is a condition that calls most emphatically for a tonic for the blood. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are a tonic especially adapted to meet this need as they purify and enrich the blood. They tone up the nerves and give vigor, strength and health to the debilitated system. Mrs. Howard D. Chaffey, Indian Island, N.B., says: "For several winters in succession I was attacked by la grippe which left me weak and badly run down. In each case I used Dr. Williams' Pink Pills with the most beneficial results. Last winter when the trouble was again prevalent I took the precaution of fortifying my system with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and escaped the trouble, while many of my neighbors were down with it. In fact I enjoyed the best of health all spring and feel sure this medicine will so fortify the system as to prevent the trouble."

These Pills are sold by all medicine dealers or may be had by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

AIREDALE THE BEST DOG.

For Military Purpose the Airedale Beats All Others.

The finest military dog is the Airedale, in the opinion of Major E. H. Richardson, a breeder of war dogs, who was in charge of a pack of bloodhounds with the Belgian army until they were lost in the disaster at Mons.

He says the Airedale can stand any climate, is second to none in faithfulness and intelligence, has powers of hearing and scent remarkably acute, and in the right size, whether used on sentry duty, scouting, searching for the wounded or as a messenger or ammunition carrier.

"He can hear 300 yards farther than a man and knows friend from foe by their smell," says Major Richardson. "A man's smell depends on what he eats, so a dog can tell the difference between English, French and Germans even when dressed in the same kind of clothes."

An officer wrote to the major in regard to one of his dogs:

"Don was blown twenty yards by a bursting shell. He was not hit, only scared. He declined to face the music any more, until after a lot of coaxing, when he went back on night duty, watching and listening in the trenches with the intentness of the most seasoned sentry, aided further by a sense of sight and smell that was almost uncanny."

THREE REASONS.

Each With Two Legs and Ten Fingers.

An Eastern woman who is a fond mother writes an amusing article about her experience feeding her boys.

Among other things she says: "Three chubby, rosy-cheeked boys, Bob, Jack and Dick, respectively, are three of our reasons for using and recommending the food, Grape-Nuts, for these youngsters have been fed on Grape-Nuts since infancy, and often between meals when other children would have been given candy.

"I gave a package of Grape-Nuts to a neighbor whose 3-year-old child was a weakened little thing, all half the time. The little tot ate the Grape-Nuts and cream greedily and the mother continued the good work, and it was not long before a truly wonderful change manifested itself in the child's face and body. The results were remarkable, even for Grape-Nuts.

"Both husband and I use Grape-Nuts every day and keep strong and well and have three of the finest, healthiest boys you can find in a day's march."

Many mothers instead of destroying the children's stomachs with candy and cake give the youngsters a handful of Grape-Nuts when they are begging for something in the way of sweets. The result is soon shown in greatly increased health, strength and mental activity.

HARVESTING THE ICE CROP.

Co-operation Among Farmers an Advantage in the Work.

There are few localities in Canada that have not available a river or smaller stream from which a supply of ice may be obtained for use during the summer months. The ease with which the ice crop may be secured is probably the reason why it is not taken advantage of to a greater extent than at present. For economical harvesting operations it is advisable that a number of the farmers of a community co-operate, sharing the expense, and making the labor proportionately lighter.

A few tools are necessary to harvest the ice supply efficiently. A steel scraper to remove the snow covering is desirable; some styles of road scrapers may be used, or a very good home-made scraper may be made of wood and faced with a strip of steel. An ice plough facilitates the work of scoring into blocks for breaking off. A slice bar for breaking off the blocks can be made similar to a crowbar, with a sharp blade from six to eight inches wide. An ice saw may be improvised by removing one handle of a crosscut saw. A number of pike poles, ice tongs and a chain, with heavy pair of ice tongs attached, complete the tools required. A platform, one end of which may be let down into the water, and the other end raised level with the floor of the sleigh, permits the use of a horse in taking the ice out of the water and loading on the sleigh.

The ice should be packed as solidly as possible in the ice house and care taken to have sufficient insulating material around the outside and on top. If more ice is required than can be accommodated in the ice house, it may be piled outside, first laying boards on the ground, and covering them with a layer of sawdust or straw. The sides and top should also be well covered and protected with boards to prevent the wind carrying away the insulating material. Sorted in this way the ice

A MOTHER'S ANXIETY

Most mothers are anxious when their little ones are teething, for at this time the baby's stomach gets disordered and there is a grave danger of convulsions. This anxiety can be lessened, however, if the mother keeps a supply of Baby's Own Tablets in the house and gives an occasional dose to her teething baby. The Tablets are the very best medicine in the world during the teething time. They regulate the bowels, sweeten the stomach, promote healthful sleep and make teething painless. They are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

POTASH AND WOOD ASHES.

Some Valuable Products for Land Improvement.

With the supply of potash from the German mines shut off by war conditions, Canada should now give attention to the large quantity of this fertilizing agent which is allowed to go to waste through want of care and conservation of the annual production of wood ashes.

Throughout a large part of Canada the chief fuel at all seasons, but more especially in winter, is wood. In the eastern provinces, hardwoods are chiefly used. These woods, especially beech and maple, are rich in potash, varying from 5 to 12 per cent., according to conditions of growth of the wood and care of the ashes. Other valuable ingredients of wood ashes are a small proportion of phosphoric acid and about fifty per cent. of carbonate of lime.

In the clearing of wood lots and in the burning of debris after taking out the fuel supply, large amounts of ashes are produced. These, as a rule, are left where the burning is done, and are consequently wasted.

Wood ashes should be carefully stored in fire-proof receptacles if possible; in any event away from any danger of fire, and should be kept dry to avoid leaching. In the spring they should be spread upon the land. They are especially valuable as a fertilizer and to encourage the growth of clover and the better grasses.

Wood ashes, by hastening the decay of organic matter in soils, render more readily available the nitrogen contained therein. In sandy soil, wood ashes supply the phosphoric acid and lime in which these soils are deficient, while, on clay lands, the lime content of the ashes tends to render available the potash salts already present in abundance. Potash as supplied to the land through the medium of wood ashes has a distinct advantage over the potash salts imported from Germany, in that it is in a very soluble form, and hence is at once available for plant food.

The importance of wood ashes, as shown above, as a fertilizer can hardly be over-estimated. It is consequently of first interest to the agriculturists and lumber interests of Canada to conserve the supply wherever and by what process produced.

During the present winter large undertakings in land clearing and right-of-way clearing of railway lines will be in progress from the burning of the debris of which large amounts of ashes will accumulate. Some steps should be taken to provide that these ashes are not wasted, as, apart from the difficulty of securing potash supplies, the market value of ashes at present is from $8.00 to $12.000 per ton, depending upon quality.

DODD'S KIDNEY PILLS CURED JEAN BAPTISTE TAPP.

Quebec Man Who Suffered from Kidney Disease for Years is again a Robust, Healthy man.

L'Anse-a-Valleau, Gaspe Co., Que., Jan. 20th (Special)—"I am happy to tell you Dodd's Kidney Pills made me well." So says Jean Baptiste Tapp, a well known and highly respected resident of this place. And so thankful is Mr. Tapp for the benefits he has received from Dodd's Kidney Pills that he wants the whole world to know it. He wants others who suffer as he did to know the cure.

"For many years I suffered from kidney disease," Mr. Tapp says. "It started from a cold, and gradually grew worse. My skin had a harsh, dry feeling, my appetite was fitful and I perspired freely with the slightest exertion. I had flashes of light before my eyes and I was always tired and nervous.

"Finally rheumatism was added to my troubles, while attacks of sciatica and neuralgia followed. The doctor who attended me and the medicine I tried, failed to help me till I decided to use Dodd's Kidney Pills. I took four boxes in all, and to-day I am a robust man in excellent health."

60 WIDOWS IN ONE STREET.

Who Suffer Their Bereavement with Splendid Fortitude.

There is a road in Gillingham, England, which deserves to be called the Street of Sorrows. There are 130 houses in it—two monotonous rows of small, plain houses along less than a quarter-mile of drab street, with only its name, Chanter Road, to distinguish it in peace from a score of others in this unlovely neighborhood.

Now it has a sad distinction. The war has made sixty women widows in that street. Sixty widows in 120 houses. It is a poignant example of how Chatham and the district near, including Rochester, Strood, Gillingham and Rainham, have suffered by the naval losses since August.

The Formidable is the ninth boat manned by men of the Chatham division that has been lost. The others are the Aboukir, Hogue, Cressy, Hermes, Pathfinder, Speedy, Hawke and Rohilla.

The Mayor of Chatham, Alderman Payne, stated that there were over 500 families bereaved in the district. "The splendid fortitude of the women," he said, "is an inspiration to us all."

The Mysterious Thyroid.

The thyroid gland, which is situated about the lower part of the throat, is still a medical mystery. Practically nothing is known as to its uses, and very little about the causes of disease in it. Goitre is a non-malignant enlargement of the thyroid gland. The swelling may be no more than a mere thickening, or it may grow into a mass weighing several pounds. It is common in mountainous districts and where there is magnesian limestone in the soil and drinking water. Operation may be necessary, but goitre will usually yield to treatment, and is rarely fatal. Malignant disease of the thyroid gland is often associated with overstrain or sudden shock. Here operation is generally necessary, and is a very serious matter indeed. In some mysterious way removal of the thyroid gland affects the mental powers, and the unfortunate person who has his thyroid removed is in great danger of losing his wits, more particularly his memory.

Dangerous Throat Troubles Prevented by Nerviline

IT ENDS MISERY OF COLDS QUICKLY.

Don't wait till night.

Get after your cold now,—this very minute, before it grows dangerous you should apply old-time "Nerviline."

Rub your chest and throat, rub them thoroughly with Nerviline. Relief will be immediate.

Nerviline will save you from lying awake to night, coughing, choking and suffering from congestion in the chest and acute pain in the throat.

Nerviline will break up that dull neuralgic headache—will kill the cold and chill at its very beginning—will save you from perhaps a serious illness.

To take away hoarseness, to break up a grippy cold, to cure a sore throat or bad cold in the chest, you can use nothing so speedy and effective as Nerviline. For forty years it has been the most largely used family remedy in the Dominion. Time has proved its merit, so can you by keeping handy on the shelf the large 50c. family size bottle; small trial size 25c., sold by any dealer anywhere.

GERMANY BEST IN LONG WAR.

Count Reventlow Thinks Teutons Can Beat Allies in Time.

The London Daily Chronicle prints an article by Count Reventlow, in which he says:

"We know in Germany that not only can we last out a long war, but also that we can last out a long war better than our enemies—politically, militarily and economically. We know the longer the war lasts, so much better will be our world standing.

Because of that the entire German people enter upon the new year full of courage and confident of ultimate victory. From Kaiser to working man, all Germans know the struggle can last as long time yet, but likewise they all know the German people ultimately will win. Domestic controversies have disappeared and all Germans stand together as one man.

WAITERS GET CHANCE.

British Take Places in Restaurants of Alien Enemies.

"No alien enemies employed in this establishment" is one of the signs now confronting loungers in the majority of the restaurants, tea shops and eating places of the middle and cheap grades, says the London Chronicle. Some go even further and announce "No alien enemies are employed or served." This is a triumph for the British Waiters' Union.

Before the war foreigners from the Continent monopolized the waiters' calling throughout England, except in a few of the old fashioned British establishments, particularly those in the heart of London, where an old guard of business men, living up to the traditions of former generations, remain faithful to their turtle soup and beefsteak and bottle of port for their midday meal, and cling to famous old resorts, which may have been clean and comfortable, according to the standard of Dickens and Thackeray's time, but we'd command the attentions of the third and of health in an up-to-date city.

The staffs of the larger English hotels, from the manager's office to the kitchen, were manned by foreigners. Most of these hotels are owned by companies and the stockholders placed dividends before loyalty to British servants when British employees had been proven less profitable than aliens. Germans, Swiss and Italians had taken the hotel and restaurant business by storm.

The British Waiters' Union clamored for recognition vainly until the war. Then the newspapers took up their case, and there has resulted a clean sweep of Germans, Austrians and of Swiss who speak with a German accent. The big hotels are too dignified to placard their windows with the signs that alien enemies are not employed, but they make a more conspicuous and more diplomatic show of patriotism by covering their fronts with flags and loyal mottoes.

The case of German restaurants and shops which have professed to purvey genuine German foods and beers is especially pathetic. One of the latter, which has many branches in London, has filled its windows with signs that its sausages are made from British pork at its own factory in the north of England, and also makes announcement of its contributions to the Prince of Wales' Relief Fund. Another explains that the alien owners were bought out by British capital years ago, but the German name was retained to keep the old customers.

Death Nearly Claimed New Brunswick Lady

Was Restored to Her Anxious Family When Hope Had Gone.

St. John, N.B., Dec. 15.—At one time it was feared that Mrs. J. Grant, of 3 White St., would succumb to the deadly ravages of advanced kidney trouble. "My first attacks of back ache and kidney trouble began years ago. For six years that dull gnawing pain has been present. When I exerted myself it was terribly intensified. If I caught cold the pain was unendurable. I tried most everything, but nothing gave that certain grateful relief that came from Dr. Hamilton's Pills of Mandrake and Butternut. Instead of being bowed down with pain, to-day I am strong, enjoy splendid appetite, sleep soundly. Lost properties have been instilled into my blood —cheeks are rosy with color, and I thank that day that I heard of so grand a medicine as Dr. Hamilton's Pills."

Every woman should use these pills regularly because good health pays, and it's good, vigorous health that comes to all who use Dr. Hamilton's Mandrake and Butternut Pills.

"Yes, dear. What would you like to give?"

BRUCE COUNTY COUNCIL

The opening Session of the County Council for this year was held at Walkerton. Commencing as per statute on Tuesday afternoon. All members were present and proceeded at once to elect a Warden.

Those nominated were Messrs Izzard, Port Elgin, Murdock, Lucknow; Pilsinger, Carrick; Williamson, Huron; Jas Hunter, Kincardine Tp; McNab, Walkerton; McCannel, Saugeen; Kastner, Wiarton; and Douglas, Hepworth.

Messrs. Izzard, Murdoch, Pilsinger, Williamson, Hunter, Kastner and Douglas retired leaving the field to Messrs. McCannel and McNab.

McCannel received 20 votes on the first vote and McNab 12 thereby electing McCannel.

On taking the chair Mr. McCannel thanked the members for the honor done him and outlined many matters of importance likely to come before council this year.

The standing committees for the year were selected as follows:

THE STORE WIT

Continuing many letters from the officers of the Belgian Relief Fund and the Red Cross Society thanking the council for the liberal grants made to these funds at the December Session.

Messrs W J Taylor and H McLaren were reappointed Municipal Auditors.

Messrs. McNab and N Robertson were reappointed Auditors of Criminal Justice Accounts.

The usual grants were made of $7.50 to each Agricultural Society; $5 to each Farmers' and Women's Institute; $5 to each rural School Library having at least 100 volumes where the moneys before voted for this purpose have been applied to the purchase of books only; $15 to each Public Library having under 1500 volumes and $30 to each library having 1500 volumes or over. A change was made as to payment of these grants none of which will be paid before the 15th of November. Treasurers will kindly note this and so save much useless correspondence.

The question of a grant for patriotic purposes was before the council. There appeared no difference of opinion about a grant but the amount and application raised some discussion. The finance Committee brought in a report on this that while they believed this prosperous County should contribute one mill on the dollar, they recommended that one half mill be raised this year and leave it to next year's council to raise another half mill next year if required. This report was adopted, $10,000 of this amount to go to the Canadian Patriotic Fund, $2,500 to the Canadian Red Cross Fund and the balance to the Belgian Relief Fund, the amount to the Patriotic Fund to be paid in 10 equal monthly instalments commencing in March and the Red Cross and Belgian amounts to be paid quarterly.

Mr Ames, M P., of Montreal, Hon. Sec of the Patriotic Fund, was introduced to the council and explained the objects and working of this fund, showing how it was used to maintain the families of soldiers at the front and how this is done through local Committees where the different families resided so the local men could see just what each family required, how many to it and all about it. In this way each family got its proper share and the cost of administering the fund is reduced to a minimum.

Judge Barrett wrote the Council asking that a court stenographer be appointed as the trial of cases was much delayed by not having one and cases could not be nearly as well tried. The saving to County in fees of juries, witnesses and others would more than amount to the salary. The council appointed a committee to arrange this and an appointment was made at a salary of $2.50.

Mr Keeling of Southampton continuation school, and Mr Gould of Mildmay school, were appointed on the board of examiners.

The usual grants to assisted schools were made.

Messrs. Nesbitt and Phelan asked that a foot bridge be built on the Cargill bridge but Council declined to do so as other bridges in which County is interested have not such walks.

The usual grant of $500 was made to four northern Tps, on motion of Messrs. Forbes and Monn.

A grant of $2.50 per day was made to each member of a local company drilling at company headquarters, not to exceed $5 per man.

Mr Whicher of Albermarle claimed his Tp. was over assessed and asked to have the matter adjusted. The question will be considered.

The good surgeon reported that the Turnkey was seriously ill and required an operation. As this appeared to be part of the responsibilities of the County this was authorized.

The report of the Keeper and Physician of the House of Refuge showed 53 inmates and that the average cost per week of each person last year was $1.62. The reports of the Physician and House Committee complimented Mr and Mrs Wiles, the keeper and matron, for the manner in which they were discharging their duties.

The council heard with regret of the death of His Honor Judge Barrett. All the members were more or less acquainted with him and many and deep were the expressions of regret on every hand. A committee was appointed to convey the condolences of the council to Mrs Barrett and the family.

The council concluded its work on Friday and adjourned to meet in Kincardine on Monday, May 31st next at 7.30 p.m.

—Announcement of the death of Judge Barrett is heard with regret from all who have been associated with him in the county. His geniality on the bench and private life will long be remembered there. Who is to be his successor is the question that arises in discussing the passing away of our senior judge. The answer is found coming quite readily from many lips. Why not His Honor Judge Klein, the junior judge? He has occupied that position for many years, coming to Paisley every two months to dispense Division Court justice. We believe, as a great many others do, in promotion for such offices. We know that Judge Klein is very much appreciated in this part for the careful manner in which he weighs evidence, and his judgments are always accepted without dissent. His demeanor on the bench is dignified and irreproachable. We have no doubt about the sentiment in this section of the county being in favor of his promotion to be senior judge of Bruce county.

—A new high school building is to be erected in Dorham. The Chronicle observes that the structure will be substantial, but not highly ornamental, adding that ornament is not essential, and in no case should it overshadow the usefulness of an educational or any other structure. The Durham high school board have probably discovered, as Paisley school board did, that attention to certain sanitary details in building plans calls for sacrifice of the ornamental feature of architecture unless the ratepayers who foot the bills are willing to provide for both. Proper ventilating, lighting and sanitation schemes are the first essentials in a school where the young and growing generation is to spend a good part of their waking hours during an average of seven years that is required to give them a common school course, and still more years for those who enter continuation or high school. When it comes to considering these points the Paisley School Board certainly changed their ideas as to style of architecture, adopting the flat roof and plain lines throughout all construction work. While the building that has risen upon these plans may fail to please the eye from an exterior viewpoint, there is not a doubt but that the completeness of its interior equipment will prove a blessing to succeeding generations of boys, girls and teachers who will occupy the seats and desks for the future.

—The special sales put on by Paisley merchants in this and past seasons have been great business getters, and go to prove the advantage of adopting up-to-date business methods. Some people won't buy anything but the last patterns, styles and weaves in wearing apparel, while others are not particular about the new ideas and are ready to sacrifice appearances for comfort when it comes to consideration of values. The merchant has two classes of people to whom he may cater to advantage, and the city department stores have demonstrated how it can best be done—by offering the new goods in profusion in their proper season and then clearing out the balance at lower prices before allowing them to become shopworn. In this policy the small town and village merchant is following the example of his big rival and revolutionizing his own business, benefitting both himself and his customers thereby. One three leading general stores have all offered a lot of genuine bargains at their clearing sales, and the public has taken full advantage of the opportunity to obtain cheap staple goods. A POSITIVE CURE FOR RHEUMATISM

READ THIS LETTER

55 DOVERCOURT ROAD, Oct., 1st, 1913.

"For a long time, I have thought of writing you regarding what I term a most remarkable cure effected by your remedy "Fruit-a-tives". I suffered from Rheumatism, especially in my hands. I have spent a lot of money without any good results. I have taken "Fruit-a-tives" for 18 months now, and am pleased to tell you that I am cured. All the enlargement has not left my hands and perhaps never will, but the soreness is all gone and I can do any kind of work. I have gained 15 pounds in 18 months".

R. A. WAUGH

Rheumatism is no longer the dreaded disease it once was. Rheumatism is no longer one of the "incurable diseases". "Fruit-a-tives" has proved its marvellous powers over Rheumatism, Sciatica, Lumbago—in fact, over all such diseases which arise from some derangement of stomach, bowels, kidneys or skin.

"Fruit-a-tives" is sold by all dealers at 50c. a box, 6 for $2.50, trial size, 25c. or sent postpaid on receipt of price by Fruit-a-tives Limited, Ottawa.

RECRUITING

(From the Scottish American.)

The air was sultry inside the recruiting office. The sergeant, who did the eye-testing, had unbuttoned his jacket and loosened the collar of his shirt. The officer sitting at his desk mopped his shining head with a damp handkerchief. The doctor thought of ice tinkling softly into a tumbler, and groaned.

It was then that Malcolm McDonald entered. He was six feet six inches high, broad in proportion, and had a gentle smile that would have disarmed a wasp. He shook hands with everyone and handed round a poke of peppermints.

"Where are you from?" queried the officer.

"Ta Lewis," said Malcolm.

"When were you born?"

"Bless me! it was a goot long time ago now.

"Haven't you got a birth certificate?"

"Fat's tat?"

"A paper giving date of birth, parents' names, etc."

"She's no needin' a bit paper to tell 'er she wass porn at all. Just put town she was porn ta day Black Colin's mare dee't."

"What religion are you?"

"She was a Christian when she left ta Lewis; but she's beeu five or six days in Glesca, ant she iss not sure at aal what she iss now."

"Are you married or single?"

"She wass goin' wis Merry McColl in ta Lewis, so she's no jist merriet, and she's no jist single."

"Ever had any serious trouble?"

"She lost a stirk wance. She wass called Dugle. A fine beast wass Dugle, whateffer."

"I mean have you ever had any measles or mumps, or anything else?"

"Tuts! who would have measles or mumps in ta Lewis? She wance had a headache nevertheless."

"Ever been in prison?"

"Wance. Wait till she tells you ta joke it wass. Herself and Hamish M'Phun took a trip to Stornoway to see ta croots and ta shops. It wass a grant time, but twa polis was aye followin' us up. She was na wantin' tat, so she lifts ta twa polis, wan in each hand, ant smacks their heads thegither, ant piles tem up on ta roodside. Ten six polis comes up, ant we had a very coot time, but herself ant Hamish got bate. Tey put Hamish and herself in jail; but tere wass a steamer leavin' for ta Lewis early next mornin', so after a goot sleep she loosened ta bit bars in ta window, ant herself ant Hamish wass out in fine time for ta steamer. We never went back to Stornoway; oh, no, never again."

A soldier popped his head in at the door. "Are ye no done wi' that Hielander yet?" he demanded. "There's ten thoosand fitba' enthusiasts waitin' oot here tae get jinin' Kitchener's army."

"Then, Malcolm M'Donald," said the officer, rising, "away you go up to Maryhill, and they'll tell you what to do. And just to promote good feeling, M'Donald, we'll each have another peppermint."

WOMEN FROM 45 to 55 TESTIFY

To the Merit of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound during Change of Life.

Westbrook, Me. — "I was passing through the Change of Life and had pains in my back and side and was so weak I could hardly do my housework. I have taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and it has done me a lot of good. I will recommend your medicine to my friends and give you permission to publish my testimonial." — Mrs. LAWRENCE MARTIN, 12 King St., Westbrook, Maine.

Manston, Wis. — "At the Change of Life I suffered with pains in my back and loins until I could not stand. I also had night-sweats so that the sheets would be wet. I tried other medicine but got no relief. After taking one bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound I began to improve and I continued its use for six months. The pains left me, the night-sweats and hot flashes grew less, and in one year I was a different woman. I know I have to thank you for my continued good health ever since." — Mrs. M. J. BROWNELL, Manston, Wis.

The success of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, made from roots and herbs, is unparalleled in such cases.

If you want special advice write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. (confidential) Lynn, Mass. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman, and held in strict confidence.

Smart Young Farmers Get Free Instruction

Forty-three bright young farmer boys from Ontario farms are now enjoying the fruits of some special labor they undertook during the year 1914 under supervision of the provincial department. They are the winners of the acre profit competition conducted in nearly every county, and the crops they grew were of their own choosing and cultivation. They began a few days ago a special two weeks' course in stock and seed judging at the Guelph College, and all their expenses and transportation will be borne by the government. There were 400 competitors and where more than 12 came from a county two prizes were granted. The work of the departmental representatives was manifest in the keen competition raised.

In the following schedules potatoes were valued at 40 cents per bushel, oats at 50, peas at $2, turnips at 10 cents, mangels at 12 cents, seed corn at $1 and silage corn at $2.75 per ton.

The winners with their home county, yields and net profits read as follows: Potatoes—S G Davis, Brantford, 239 bushels, $69 49; W J Crawford, Bruce, 415¾, $120; J D Crombie, Dufferin, 323½, $96 65; R L Fallis, Durham, 312, $86 34; H H Hayes, Leeds and Grenville, 286, $76 60; C Lamont, Middlesex, 501, $167 10; W G Johnston, Norfolk, 208, $49 85; M Herrington, Northumberland, 385, $105 85; C E Broughton, Ontario, 259, $64 51; N Innes, Oxford, 350, $70 18; O Cameron, Rainy River, 410, $99 70; G D Courts, Simcoe, 403, $116 75; I O Partridge, Simcoe, 376, $110 10; G Moore, Welland, 320, $62 07. Oats—A Denison, Carleton, 83, $30 57; B Nephew, Dundas, 82, $27 33; W B Hamilton, 86, $25 30; R Shillington, Frontenac, 59½, $16 67; J W Orr, 48, $12 25; L Strohm, Haldimand, 70, $18 43; C Owens, Lanark, 76, $28 68; H Smith, 75, $25 42; A Pincombe, Middlesex, 70, $22 62; A A Goltz, Muskoka, 82, $29 92; J C Salisbury, Peel, 73, $23; A Cowieson, York, 76, $28 70; R Marion, 69, $22 52. Peas—R McKenzie, Thunder Bay, 38½, $53 50. Turnips—Wm Ryan, Renfrew, 1015, $74 80; G F Manning, Victoria, 1090, $80 70. Mangels—Thos Collyer, Peterboro, 681, $50 98. Seed corn—Tyler Humber, Essex, 95, $81 30; F J Adams, 90, $77 45; Leo Flynn, Lennox and Addington, 105 1-5, $73 19; J J Kearns, 65, $44 23. Silage corn—W R Graham, Grey, 20.75 tons, $39 17; R Jennings, Manitoulin, 24, $55 03; John Williamson, 19, $28 80; D Butler, Norfolk, 17.35, $29 95; A Innes, Oxford, 26, $58 76; W Fox, Prince Edward, 20, $40 72.

THE REDUCTION IN GRANTS

(Kincardine Review)

Several agricultural associations have complained against the reduction in the provincial grant. Have these associations stopped to think before passing their resolutions? Do they think that the government has an inexhaustible supply of money? Do they know that it is as difficult in war time for a government to get money as it is for an individual?

The revenues of Ontario were buoyant until a year or two ago. Money was flowing in freely. The government distributed it just as freely. Money is not coming in as freely now. Almost every source of revenue shows a falling off. The government has therefore to cut down its expenditures.

Agricultural associations will simply have to do with less money or else find other ways of raising funds. The latter should not be a difficult proposition. There are many members of such associations who should give $5 instead of $1. Membership should mean a minimum fee of $2 00 (in most cases it is only $1 00). This is a time when individuals must do more for themselves and cease looking to the government to do all.

Men Fight On Their Stomachs Napoleon said. A man with a weak stomach is pretty sure to be a poor fighter. It is difficult—almost impossible—for anyone, man or woman, if digestion is poor, to succeed in business or socially—or to enjoy life. In tablet or liquid form helps weak stomachs to strong, healthy action—helps them to digest the food that makes the good, rich, red blood which nourishes the entire body.

This vegetable remedy, to a great extent, puts the liver into activity—oils the machinery of the human system so that those who spend their working hours at the desk, behind the counter, or in the home are rejuvenated into vigorous health.

Has brought relief to many thousands every year for over forty years. It may relieve you and doubtless restore to you your former health and strength. Don't you owe it to yourself to give it a trial? DEATH OF JUDGE BARRETT

Judge William Barrett, Senior Judge of the county of Bruce, died at the Walkerton hospital on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 28th, after but a short illness. The judge underwent a minor operation on Wednesday of the previous week, from which he never recovered, the shock apparently being too great for his rundown system. He was seventy-three years of age. Besides his wife, the deceased is survived by one daughter, Mrs C P Bate of Brampton, and three sons, Dr Lawrie of Galt, Ethelbert of St Paul, and Walter of New York. The funeral took place to the Walkerton cemetery on Saturday.

Judge Barrett began his law practice as a barrister in 1869. He was appointed Junior Judge of Bruce county in September, 1886, and became Senior Judge in 1891. In 1902 he married Mrs Anne Wilkes, widow of the late Judge Wilkes. He was a resident of Walkerton for more than forty years, having previously been in business in Durham. He was an excellent judge, well thought of all over the county. He was always interested in all public events, especially those affecting the county of Bruce. In the matter of sports he was an ardent fisherman. He had a summer home at Southampton, where he used to spend three months every year, doing his business from there. Last summer his health did not permit him to go there as usual, but a sojourn at Battle Creek appeared to do him only temporary benefit.

JEFFERIES—JOHNSTON

A quiet and pretty wedding was solemnized by Rev A Logan Geggie at the home of the bride's mother, 311 Sunnyside Avenue, Toronto, on January 27, when Isabella B., second daughter of Mrs Johnston and the late Rev J J Johnston of Paisley and Lyndoch, was married to Armand L. Jefferies, of Brantford. The house was decorated with carnations and tulips, and the wedding march was played by the bride's sister, Miss Helen. The bride entered the drawing-room leaning on the arm of her brother, Mr Joseph Johnston, of Springfield, Mass. Her gown was a soft creation of white Jacquesnette with overdress of silk-embroidered net caught with pearl ornaments and the veil she wore had been worn by her mother at her wedding. The pianist wore the palest pink crepe de chine. After dejeuner, Mr and Mrs Jefferies left for a short trip to Guelph, Brantford and Hamilton, the bride travelling in a suit of navy broadcloth with black and white hat and mink furs.

—Ripley flax mill may be in operation again soon. Mr. Geo. Anderson, of M.P.P., has a purchasing proposition under consideration.

Hints for the Home

Miscellaneous Recipes.

Bran Muffins—Two cups bran, one cup whole wheat flour, one tablespoonful molasses, two eggs, two cups milk, one teaspoonful salt, two teaspoonfuls baking powder, raisins. Bake twenty-five minutes.

Bran Bread—same recipe as for muffins, but no eggs or baking powder. Use one yeast cake.

To Roast Potatoes—Peel and wash potatoes and put them with the meat in the roasting pan. Leave them until they are well browned and serve them on the same platter with the roast.

Gravy—Take some of the fat from the pan, use four tablespoonfuls with four tablespoonfuls of butter and stir them together and let this mixture dredge in the pan. Add gradually one and a half cups of boiling water, cook five minutes, season with salt and pepper, and strain.

Timbale of Pumpkin.—One pint of stewed and sifted pumpkin, one tablespoonful of butter, four eggs beaten, half a cupful of sugar, one-fourth teaspoonful of cinnamon and half a pint of milk. Pour into buttered molds. Set in a pan of water in a moderate oven until firm. When the timbales are cold, unmold and serve with whipped cream.

Steamed Fruit Pudding.—Cover the bottom of a butter mold with dices of bread lightly buttered. Over this place a layer of stewed apples or peaches, then another layer of bread and butter, alternating with the fruit until the mold is three-quarters full. Pour over this a custard composed of two eggs, one-half a cup of sugar and a pint of milk. Fasten the cover of the mold tight, drop into boiling water and steam one hour. Serve with foamy sauce or sweetened cream.

Ginger Creams.—One cupful of white sugar, one half cupful of baking molasses, one cupful of sweet milk, one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in the milk, one teaspoonful each of ginger and cloves, three cupfuls of flour. Add ingredients as named. Spread thinly in tins. Bake and when cool frost with powdered sugar and cut into squares. This is a good recipe to help cut the high cost of living, as there are neither eggs nor shortening in them. They are fine for children's luncheons.

Mixed Fruit Pudding.—Peel and core enough tart apples to fill a deep baking pan. Fit them in snugly and fill in the holes left by the cores with seedless raisins and bits of shredded citron and lemon peel. Dust with sugar. Pour over them half a cupful of water and bake in a slow oven until perfectly tender. Remove them from the oven, sprinkle lightly with bread crumbs, dust with sugar and bake 10 minutes longer. Serve with the following sauce: Beat together in a stewpan one tablespoonful of flour and one-half cupful of sugar. Pour over this a cup of boiling water and bring to a boil. Remove from the fire and pour this slowly over one egg well beaten. Flavor with a dash of lemon. Pour over the baked fruit and serve immediately.

Useful Hints.

Linen is a fabric which can be easily dyed at home.

Never mix any salad with dressing until you are ready to use it.

Macaroni as an article of food is rather more valuable than bread.

A very practical way to finish a floor is to paint it with linseed oil.

A wire bread or cake cooler is a handy thing to have in the kitchen.

If a felt hat is faded or shabby the crown may be cut off to form a toque foundation.

A pretty way to serve hot biscuits is folded in a napkin on a sweetgrass basket, with a handle.

When a box of sardines is opened it should be drained of its oil at once and the fish turned out.

To have dumplings fluffy and light keep the pot boiling steadily from the time they are dropped in.

It is best not to serve the same dish twice a week, unless it be a vegetable, as everyone likes variety.

Damp salt is an excellent thing to remove stains on cups and saucers caused by tea and careless washing.

If a room is filled with smoke, open windows and wave a towel wet in vinegar and hot water around in it.

The thoughtful housewife saves all the waxed paper that comes to the house for cracker and other boxes.

Salt on the fingers, when cleaning fowl or fish, will prevent slipping, and a little vinegar on the hands will prevent odor.

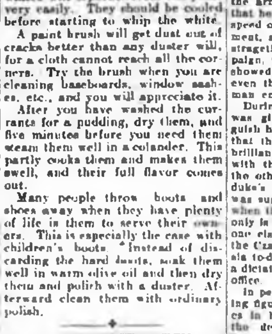
You will have no trouble with your thread kinking if you thread the needle before breaking thread from the reel.

Bread should not be put into a too hot oven; it should not brown for the first ten minutes, and only gradually afterwards.

To renovate a white enamel bedstead rub the iron parts all over with a cloth dipped in paraffin; then paint it with white enamel paint.

In heating the oven, the drafts should be closed when the coal is well started. In a word, to save fuel plan ahead and then watch drafts.

After washing quilts and comforts and while they are still on the line but nearly dry, beat them with a carpet beater and they will be wonderfully light.



A good way to clean mirrors is to wipe them with a pad dipped in whiting and warm water. Then dry with a soft cloth and polish with a piece of chamois skin.

If eggs are placed in hot water a few minutes before breaking the whites will separate from the yolks very easily. They should be cooled before starting to whip the white.

A paint brush will get dust out of cracks better than any duster will, for a cloth cannot reach all the corners. Try the brush when you are cleaning baseboards, window sashes, etc., and you will appreciate it.

After you have washed the currants for a pudding, dry them, and five minutes before you need them steam them well in a colander. This partly cooks them and makes them swell, and their full flavor comes out.

Many people throw boots and shoes away when they have plenty of life in them to serve their owners. This is especially the case with children's boots. Instead of discarding the hard boots, soak them well in warm olive oil and then dry them and polish with a duster. Afterward clean them with ordinary polish.

New Deadly Weapon.

This little steel arrow, about the same size as a pencil, is in great favor with the French aviators. The Flechette, as it is called, when dropped from a height of 3,000 feet, will penetrate a man from his helmet to his feet. Members of the French Aviation Corps have also been experimenting with the arrow for use against dirigibles. Because of the easier manoeuvring and great speed of the aeroplane it can readily soar over the dirigible and drop these Flechettes on the gas bag and probably explode the enemy's craft.

GERMAN TOYS.

A Movement Has Begun to Reform Their Character.

Certain cities of Germany, particularly Nuremberg, have since mediaeval times been celebrated for their toys. The Nuremberg dolls, with porcelain faces, have enjoyed a celebrity that began in the fourteenth century. At the same time, the people of Nuremberg began to make dolls' houses much like those that children admire so much to-day. In the year 1572, the Elector Augustus of Saxony ordered a table service for his three daughters, consisting, among other things, of seventy-one plates, 150 glasses, thirty-six tablespoons, and twenty-eight egg cups. That collection has been preserved to this day. In a sense it is an historical document, for it contains no forks. Forks came later. Albert IV of Bavaria had a very realistic house made for his children. It was complete from cellar to greenhouse, and it included even a household chapel and a ballroom. In the grounds were stables and a menagerie.

In recent years there is a movement in Germany to reform the character of the toys, a movement that has the hearty support of educators. Those who lead the movement have set their faces against the kind of toys with which the market is too often crowded—realistic imitations about which there is no atmosphere of strangeness or romance, and which, for the most part, are commonplace and ugly.

The Dresden toys, so called are designed to remedy this fault; to hold the child's attention by the beauty and simplicity of their design, and by some fantastic deviation from the actual. The toys are the work of men who are interested in encouraging an artistic instinct in the young. Most toys do not foster the child's inherent feeling for beauty and harmony, but actually repress it by reason of their conventionality and ugliness. The new toys are at once simpler and more the product of the imagination. They strongly resemble the wood carvings of primitive peoples, whose imaginative faculties were much like those of the children of to-day.

The toys manufactured on the Dresden plan do not look at all machine-made. They have a novelty, an individuality that pleases the child. Besides the single figures, there are groups designed on the same plan—farms, villages, or menageries. In such series, the toys are colored on a simple and effective basis of color harmony.

Among the prominent reformers of children's toys is the author, Frank Wedekind, who is also the inventor of the "German discus" and the "bicycle swing," which are intended to develop in older children agility as well as control of the body's movements through will power and sureness of eye.

THE GREAT GRAND DUKE.

Present Commander-in-chief of the Russian Army.

If the Russian army is a more efficient instrument to-day than it was ten years ago, it has the Grand Duke Nicholas, its present commander in chief to thank. After the disasters of the Japanese War, the grand duke, already well known as a brilliant cavalry officer, undertook to reorganize the army, and the event has proved that he really performed wonders. In speed of mobilization, agility of movement, and intelligent response to the strategical opportunities of the campaign, the Russian forces actually showed something that approached even the high standard of their German enemy.

During the Japanese War Nicholas was given no opportunity to distinguish himself; some observers believe that the Czar's jealousy of his more brilliant cousin had something to do with that. But with the collapse of the other military leaders, the grand duke's chance came, and no one else was suggested for the chief command when the present war broke out. Not only is he in authority in the field; no one else has so much influence with the Czar. Indeed, his position in Russia to-day is said to be almost that of a dictator, without the trappings of the office.

In person, the grand duke is a striking figure; he is six feet and six inches in height, spare and active, with the delicate features and graceful bearing of the aristocrat. In youth his head was covered with short golden curls; now at fifty-eight their is not much hair left, and that has turned gray. His eyes are blue and very keen, his nose is prominent, his mouth determined and a little cruel in expression, and his chin strong. His personality is so much more remarkable than that of any of the descendants of Alexander II—he is himself the son of a brother of that monarch—that he has always had to bear some suspicion and dislike both from Alexander III and from the present Czar Nicholas II. It is because he has made himself indispensible to the latter monarch that he has risen to power at last.

No one was of more service than the grand duke in restoring order and confidence after the humiliating breakdown of Russian credit at the end of the Japanese War. No one could accuse Nicholas of being anything but a believer in the essentials of Russian autocracy, but he is said to have supported Count de Witte against the reactionary party at that time, and it was his arguments, so we are told, that finally persuaded the Czar to summon the first Duma.

The father of the grand duke was a man of very dissipated life, and the conduct of the son has not been above reproach, yet he has an intellect, an ambition, and a patriotism that would not let him wholly waste his life in ignoble ways. In blood he is half German, for his mother was of the ducal house of Oldenburg. As a young man he recouped the family's financial fortunes, which his father's extravagances had brought low, by a morganatic marriage with the rich widow of a Moscow tea merchant. After her death he married the Princess Anastasia of Montenegro, who is sister of the Queen of Italy. Both princesses spent much of their girlhood in the royal family at Petrograd, and the Grand Duke is said always to have been in love with his present wife.

FINEST FIGHT EVER WAGED.

When Oxfords Were Pitted Against the Germans.

The personal element in warfare, the battle of brains against brains, is strikingly illustrated in a letter from a captain of the 52nd Foot, 2nd Battalion Oxfordshire and Buckinghamshire Light Infantry. Writing to his sister he says:

"We were sent off to help the Guards to hold up a line previously held by a regiment which was almost annihilated because they were not dug in deep enough. As soon as it was light the Germans opened with all guns. Lots of our men were buried in the trenches, but we got out into others.

"About three o'clock, I saw the regiment on our left retiring. This was the absolute devil, as it meant I had to get out. I was told to retire and try and stop the Germans getting past a certain road. From then on it was awful. As soon as we left the trenches they opened on us with every gun and rifle.

"Luckily I got the new position and collected about 150 men. Things looked real nasty, as the Germans were pouring in through the gap and filling the wood we were in. Under the circumstances I thought to do something unexpected might upset their apple-cart. So we fixed bayonets and went straight in. We had the finest fight that ever was fought. We first came on some fifty of them, went straight in, and annihilated them. We were very quickly into the next lot, and in a few minutes we were shooting, bayoneting and annihilating everything we came across.

"To cut a long story short, we drove the whole crowd back. I had five holes in my coat as a souvenir. We went on occupying this position in the trenches, which was vitally important, for about three days. The German trenches were only twenty-five yards in front of us. It was very uncomfortable having them so close. Two subalterns and two soldiers placed themselves so skilfully behind a big lump in the ground that they saw the whole length of the German trenches. They then let drive with their rifles, with the result that they stampeded the lot and killed forty.

"I afterwards took a party of twenty-five to reconnoitre, and we found these forty dead. In fact, in a space of 150 yards there may have been 400 or 500 dead. I gave instructions for a lieutenant to remain out with a covering party, and went to search the dead to see who they belonged to. I was just in the middle of the job, when, on looking into the trench, I found it full of live Germans, who at once opened fire. How they missed me I don't know, as I was absolutely on the point of stepping across the trench.

"The thing gave me such a shock that most of the Germans got away. However, the staff are awfully pleased at us having cleared them out at all. I don't think the Germans can hold out much longer—I mean here. Their losses are enormous and their men give me the impression that they try to get wounded or taken prisoners."

GET FUN OUT OF A FIGHT.

British Take Hardships and Death Lightheartedly.

Nothing more clearly shows the excellent spirit of our brave soldiers than the light-hearted manner in which hardship, and even death itself, is faced. The man who marches to action with a rollicking song on his lips, who finds nicknames for the very guns hurling destruction at him, and who makes a jest even of his own sufferings, is a hard man to beat.

First and last, Tommy Atkins is a sportsman, and even when engaged in the grim game of war he cannot forget entirely the pastimes of peace, as witness the following incident. One of our batteries was firing at a building occupied by the enemy, and our lads in the trenches watched the proceedings eagerly. At the third discharge the target crumpled up like a house of cards, and a prostrate spectator flung up his arms excitedly and yelled: "Goal!" Hardy himself couldn't have stopped that one."

Again, when at Mons the long days of retreat became days of advance for our troops, a jubilant British private described the situation tersely as "Half time. Change over." Another football enthusiast, limping painfully away from the firing-line, answered a sympathetic inquiry with a smile, and the explanation, "Got fouled in the penalty area."

That magnificent bit of marksmanship, when H.M.S. Birmingham shot away the periscope of a German submarine, was aptly described by one of the crew, who remarked, "Well bowled! Just took the bail nicely."

During the early days of the war the scarcity of blankets was a frequent topic in the trenches. "I hear there'll be a lot of chaps without blankets to-night," said one Tommy. No sooner had he spoken than a perfect hurricane of lead swept over them. "If we get much of this there'll be blankets without men, I'm thinking," came the grim reply.

A private in the trenches, raising himself to get a glimpse of the foe, had his sleeve ripped open by a bullet. "Well, I'll be darned," he said, quizzically. Another, on being told by his pal that they were facing a million of the enemy, took careful aim, fired, and replied, "No, lad; only 999,999."

Two riflemen were discussing the enormous amount of lead used daily, and one suggested the possibility of a shortage. "No fear," said his chum. "Lead's economical stuff; you can make a little go a long way." It was an Irishman who, on hearing that the German soldiers have an aversion to "cold steel," promptly retorted, "Shure, then, we'll just make it hot for them."

AN ESKIMO'S TRADE.

Give Anything He Possesses for What He Really Wants.

Among the Eskimos of the Bering Sea region, there is no fixed value for whalebone, furs, or anything they may have to trade. If one of them has anything of value, he will keep it until some white man appears with something that appeals to his eye. And the money value of what may take him does not make any difference to him. If he has a trinket that may be worth a dollar, and some one offers to give him for it something that is worth a thousand dollars, but of which he has no need, he will refuse to trade. But he will give anything he possesses for what he really wants.

An Eskimo of St. Lawrence Island, in Bering Sea, made a catch one season of a big bowhead whale. The head of baleen was worth between ten and fifteen thousand dollars. He knew the approximate value of the head, but he held on to it with no apparent desire to trade. One day a trader appeared with a small gasoline launch, valued at perhaps two or three hundred dollars. The sight of that so took the native that he straightway traded his head of bone for it.

Far out in the straits one day he ran out of gasoline. He abandoned the launch for the canoe he was towing, and paddled back to the island. But he did not regret his trade. He was satisfied, and ready to try for another whale.

WARSHIPS ON WHEELS.

Naval Vessels Imitated in Building Armored Autos.

For many weeks the commons and open spaces around London have witnessed the practising of the Royal Naval Air Service armored cars. There are many squadrons of these in existence, says the London Morning Telegraph, each consisting of four cars, fitted with Maxim quickfirers in revolving armored turrets, a one or three-pounder gun fitted on another chassis, a wireless equipment car, two supply "tender" cars, and a Red Cross car, so that the whole squadron is a complete warship on wheels. Their extreme mobility has proved their use at the front, especially in village fighting.

Besides the armored cars, each squadron has a number of motor cyclists attached as scouts. Fleet Street last week had the presence of a motor cycle carrying a Maxim gun as its side-car equipment, with a gunner and driver. The Motor Cycle Gun Brigade and the Armored Car Naval Division are growing daily, so that the latter has now a complement of nearly 2,000 officers and men.

THE CROWING OF CÆSAR.

Mrs. Fraley Slept Undisturbed By His Loudest Summons.

Mrs. Fraley poured her husband's coffee, and absently put in his two lumps of sugar. She looked pale, and there were tired shadows under her eyes. With a sudden gesture, she pushed back the sugar bowl and faced him resolutely.

"I can't stand it any longer, Henry," she said. "Something must be done."

"Can't stand what?" her husband asked. He was a peacable man, and he had a faint hope that the trouble might not be what he knew it was.

"You know what—the Redmonds' rooster. I never heard such a crow in my life. He begins at three o'clock, and he keeps it up at intervals until seven. It's all right for you to say it's a little thing,—you sleep right through it, but I can't, and I'm getting completely worn out. I'm going over to see Mrs. Redmond this afternoon and speak about it."

"Well," Mr. Fraley said, slowly, "if you really can't stand it—— But I'd put up with a good deal before I'd have any trouble with the Redmonds. They're mighty nice people, you know."

"If they're such nice people," his wife retorted, "they ought to be willing to get rid of a rooster that tortures their neighbors. Anyway, I'm going."

Accordingly, after luncheon, Mrs. Fraley went upstairs to dress for her call. Just as she was putting on her hat, however, the bell rang, and her maid announced Mrs. Redmond. Mrs. Redmond's smile was half amused, half anxious.

"I came over to speak to you about Cæsar, Mrs. Fraley—that big rooster of ours. I've been so afraid he would annoy you with that ear-piercing crow of his. You see, Cæsar is a prize fowl, and Mr. Redmond paid a big price for him, but we hadn't had him two days before I began to worry about his crowing. I told William I knew it must annoy the neighbors, and we should have to get rid of him. Then Aunt Ellen came. She is very deaf, but the first morning she came down to breakfast perfectly radiant.

"'Oh,' she cried, 'what do you think has happened? I heard your rooster crow! I haven't heard a rooster crow for ten years. Do you know, I just cried over it. It seemed so wonderful to hear something that didn't come through my ear trumpet.'

"William looked at me, and I knew what that meant. And so I came over to ask you if you could possibly endure Cæsar's racket just while Aunt Ellen is with us. Could you?"

Mrs. Fraley's eyes were warm with sympathy.

"Indeed I can!" she cried. "When I hear him crow, I'll just think how your Aunt Ellen is enjoying it. I'm sure that's little enough to do when she has to miss so much!"

So Cæsar crowed unmolested. And, curiously enough, before Aunt Ellen left, Mrs. Fraley found that she could sleep undisturbed by his loudest summons.

FORETOLD BY ANIMALS.

There Are Many Superstitions Connected With Them.

In the case of a lion, it is believed that the wearing of a claw of this animal will bring great strength.

People connected with circuses and shows have a saying that when lions get restless and uneasy either ill luck or extremely bad weather is at hand, and that when they continually wash their faces in cat-like fashion they are likely to have fits of ill temper in the near future.

Numberless are the superstitions associated with the tiger. The natives of India believe that its whiskers are a deadly poison, and that when finely chopped and secretly introduced into person's food they will assuredly cause death. What is known as "the evil eye" is greatly dreaded in India, and to avert this parents hang the claws of tigers round the necks of their children.

To see a wolf is supposed to be a good sign, but if a man sees a wolf before the wolf sees him then he will either become dumb for the time or lose his voice.

For a hare to run across anyone's path is considered a very bad sign in some parts of England, because in olden times it was believed that witches transformed themselves into hares in order to bring bad luck to their enemies.

INTERNATIONAL LESSON FEBRUARY 7.

Lesson VI., Ruth Chooses the True God—Ruth 1., Golden Text, Ruth 1-16.

Verse 6. That she might return from the country of Moab.—Naomi went out from Bethlehem-Judah with her husband and two sons. They were called Ephrathites. This is another word for Ephraimites as found in Judg. 12, 5; 1 Sam. 1 1; 1 Kings 11. 26. Bethlehem is spoken of as Ephratah. It was too "small to be among the families of Judah," but it was "the finest site in all the province of Judea" (George Adam Smith). Bethlehem as is well known, is made up of two words, "Beth," meaning "house," and "Lehem," meaning "bread". The name "house of bread" indicates that the country was exceedingly fertile.

Jehovah had visited his people.—This is a common expression in the Old Testament to denote the beneficence of God (see Gen. 21. 1; 50. 24, 25; Exod. 4. 31; 1 Sam. 2. 21; Psa. 80. 14).

7. Went on the way to return unto the land of Judah.—It was customary for the host to accompany the guest a certain distance along his way. Doubtless Naomi thought that her two daughters-in-law would go with her for a distance and then would return to their own homes. As the next verse shows, when they had gone with her as far as she thought they ought to, she said to them, "Go, return each of you to her mother's house." She presses them to return.

9. She kissed them.—The kiss was the usual greeting at meeting and parting. It is still the salutation in the Orient among men as well as women (see Gen. 29. 11, 31. 55; Exod. 4. 27). It was a mark of friendliness. There are two instances where it was used for foul purposes. Under the guise of friendship, Joab kissed Amasa, and thus taking him unawares, killed him (2 Sam. 20.9). Another instance is the well-known one of Judas.

10. Nay, but we will return with thee unto thy people.—Both of the daughters-in-law, it would seem, were determined to return with Naomi. After the fervent appeal of Naomi, as recited in verses 11-13, Orpah weakened in her determination to accompany her mother-in-law, but Ruth (verse 14) "clave unto her." The friendliness of Ruth went far deeper than that of Orpah.

15. Behold thy sister-in-law is gone back unto her people, and unto her god: return thou after thy sister-in-law.—Even after Orpah had gone, Naomi insisted upon Ruth going. She wanted to give Ruth every opportunity to go back, not only to her people, but to her god, as it was believed among the Israelites that the God of Israel did not have power over the people of other nations. David at one time pleads that he be not sent away from his own country and from the protection of the God of Israel (1 Sam. 26. 17-20).

16. Entreat me not to leave thee.—This and the following verse express emphatically Ruth's desire to remain with Naomi that there could be no other question in Naomi's mind as to Ruth's determination and steadfastness. The beauty of the language of these two verses is captivating and shows that "out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh," that beauty of form is associated with beauty of thought and conception. (See 2 Kings 2. 2-6 for a similar episode between Elijah and Elisha.)

17. Jehovah do so to me, and more also.—This is a common form of oath among the Israelites and among other people who came in close association with the Israelites (See 1 Sam. 3. 17; 14. 44; 20. 13; 2 Sam. 3. 9, 35; 19. 13; 1 Kings 2. 23; 2 Kings 6. 31).

18. She left off speaking unto her.—It is an easy play for the imagination to see these two women talking in the road together, stopping as they frankly and firmly express their views one to the other, but when the matter is settled, going on their way with gladness.

German Soldiers Go Mad.

George Prade, special Paris correspondent at the front, declares that he saw a German train painted red, go through Aix-la-Chapelle from Belgium, filled with German soldiers who had been driven mad by the war. "All exits were sealed," he writes. "The carriages were padded everywhere and each contained a dozen or more soldiers, who were writhing, shouting, foaming at the mouth, or screaming deliriously. Station officials told me that the red train made frequent trips whenever the allies' artillery had been active, and that after the murderous Yser fight it ran continuously."

If it were not for your memory you would be unable to forget.

The Darkest Hour;

Or, The Hope That Still Lived.

CHAPTER VII—(Continued).

The lovely, tired-eyed girl who was kneeling beside her did not speak for a moment. She was thinking deeply. The word "disgrace" had sunk deep into her soul, and was rankling there. Presently she lifted her head.

"Mother, there can be no disgrace connected with you. I am as sure of that as I am that we two are together here now."

A low short moan broke from the colorless lips of Lady Dare.

"Christine you do not know—you do not know!" she [illegible] despairingly. "There may be no real disgrace that is to say, if disgrace means the dishonor attaching to a crime or a sin wilfully committed. It is true that I have not wilfully dishonored myself and you two, my children. But the disgrace is there, nevertheless, and the world's discovery of the circumstances that drove me to come here to-night would mean the covering of us all with infamy. The world does not ask how or why a thing was done. It is enough for the world that it has been done. People want no more excuse than that for the throwing of mud and stones. But why need I tell you so much? It should be enough for you that I tell you you must give up Brian Hardy."

The girl rose again to her feet then.

"Mother, does this mean that you are in the power of Lord Toxford, and that he is cowardly enough to torture you with threats just for the sake of indirectly furthering his son's wish to marry me?"

"No." Lady Dare had risen now, and the mother and daughter stood confronting each other. "Thank Heaven, Lord Toxford knows nothing of this. Only three persons in all the world know the secret which is now driving me to ask of you the sacrifice of your whole life's happiness. Of those three, two have been told by me and one has found it out. It is that third one who is using the thumbscrew upon me. Not one of the three is your father. You must understand that I would rather die a hundred times over than let an inkling of the secret get to him. You have only to turn from Brian Hardy to Lord Southport, and everything will be safe for a time, at least. Christine, it breaks my heart to see you hesitate. Is the love of any man so precious that it can weigh for one instant in the balance with the honor and salvation of your family? You have renounced enough, goodness knows, for strangers. Will you not renounce a little for me?"

Under the light of the common little oil lamp the last vestige of color ebbed from Christine's lips. She caught at a chair to steady herself.

"A little!" She repeated the words bitterly. She lifted her aching eyes to her mother's face. "Oh, mother, can you, who love my father, count the sacrifice of my love for Brian and of my life with him as a little thing? And you have not thought of him. His heart will break, and his whole life become barren and dark. He loves me so well—so well! Just now, before I came to you here, he said he had a strange dread lest some calamity should come to divide us. He made me promise that our marriage should be in three weeks' time. And I promised, making only the condition that you should approve the day. Mother, I can't turn from him now. Two months ago it might have been different. But not now—not now."

"Christine, you must do it, whatever the cost." Lady Dare's face had hardened with the hardness of one who, driven to bay, has lost all feeling, all tenderness, all pity, in the one fierce struggle for life or for honor. "Christine, there is no room for choice and no time for delay. You must tell Brian Hardy now, in this very hour, that the tie between you and him must be broken at once and for ever."

"Mother, I would rather die! I would rather die!"

But the mother only repeated her terrible words: "You must, Christine. You must! Listen here!" She went up closer to the trembling girl, and whispered something in her ear. She was telling her the secret.

The telling took some moments. When it was over, Christine's strength failed her. She sank down on to the bench, helpless, dazed, [illegible]-stricken. Her face was so changed from what it had been even ten minutes before that the mother who had dealt the blow was almost afraid to look at her.

Truly this was a bitter New Year's Eve.

CHAPTER VIII.

"It seems to me as if people was leaving this 'ouse for the same reason that rats leave a ship," Timothy Nobbs said to himself some days before when the elegant luggage of Lady Dare's elegant maid Louise had been in process of piling up on the roof of the cab which had been chartered to convey that independent young woman to the railway station. "First two footmen, and then a kitchen-maid, and then you. It looks as if it was because the 'ouse was going to sink like the ships that the rats clear out of, but I suppose it's only because the place 'as been so dreadful dull just lately—what with Sir Randolph always shut up in his study, and 'er ladyship always looking as if she saw ghosts, and Mr. Hector dead, and Miss Christine away, and Master Ronald, that's the heir, worse than dead. When I think o' these things I thank the Lord that He didn't make me a gentleman with a name to keep up, and estates to carry on in the family. A fine 'un Master Ronald is now to come in for this splendid old place! Good gracious! If I 'ad been a gentleman, and 'ad sons that was to carry things on—to carry on the business as you may say—I know what I'd do with 'em. I'd tie 'em to the bed-rail till they was thirty. That's the only way as you can keep boys straight. Yes, or girls either, for that matter. Upon my word, anybody 'ud say as there was a curse on this 'ouse."

The departing French maid, standing at the open door of the cab in clothing so evidently expensive and fashionable that ignorant strangers might at a first glance have mistaken her for a lady, shrugged her thin shoulders in reply, and smiled significantly.

"There's this much curse upon it that if you and the others don't clear out of it soon you'll find yourselves thrown out without any wages. Sir Randolph and her ladyship are in pretty low water, I can tell you."

"Bah!" rejoined the butler in lofty scorn. "You must take us for a precious pack of fools, my dear, if you expect us to believe that tale. Why, isn't it known all through society that Sir Randolph is a rich man?"

The disdainful Louise gave her too honest and credulous elderly lover a look of supreme contempt.

This little scene had taken place a day or two ago. And now, on New Year's Eve, Timothy Nobbs, the unwilling bridegroom elect, was travelling to London to inspect the fish shop which was to become his own as soon as he mustered courage to go through the ordeal of matrimony. Never before, surely, had the lover of a good-looking woman—a woman, moreover, with a surprisingly large income, suddenly and mysteriously acquired—shirked this ordeal and so stubbornly.

"I can't think for the life of me what she wants me for," this elderly and decidedly unsatisfactory lover modestly said to himself over and over again as the train bore him upwards to the Metropolis. "I'm of a sober age, and she's young; or she calls 'erself young, which comes to pretty much the same thing. And then I'm a plain-looking man, even settin' apart the grey that's in my 'air and whiskers, and she's good-looking—that is, she would be good-looking if 'er skin wasn't sallow, and if she 'adn't got the beginnings of a moustache. Accordin' to 'er, Frenchmen think a moustache on a woman is a 'andsome feature; but that ain't my opinion. Then she seems to be getting rich, though 'ow she does it I can't for the life of me make out. I'd stake my last penny on it that she's been blackmailing my lady, but she can't surely 'ave been doing that to the tune of a thousand pounds in six months. Then the next difference between us is that she's flippant and flighty, while I am sober and quiet, as a self-respecting man ought to be at my age. Taking things on the whole, I must say as I agree with the cook and all the rest of 'em below stairs that it's the queerest thing in all the world that she should want to marry me, and even be willing to put a bit of 'undreds of pounds on the 'ook she's fishing for me with. Why, there's thousands of younger men as wouldn't only take 'er at twenty-four hours' notice, but would jump at the chance! And talking of fish, I am sure of what cook said about it being very queer that she should open a fish shop. Of course it's queer. She ain't the sort of woman anybody'd connect with fish. If it was millinery now—"

He did not expect his bride-elect's newly-opened fish-shop in Cannington to supply him with an explanation of this mystery of its own existence, and of her desiring that he should be its master. Yet it was destined by and by to do so. In the meantime, however, he made no secret of his surprise at the smallness and meanness of the new premises in which his future bride had set up her new business. The street in which the little shop was situated was a narrow and evil-smelling alley down which no possible customers were likely to pass.

"It's not a 'alf good enough setting for a fine young woman like you," he said insinuatingly, in order that his disappointment might not make him appear disagreeable. "And whatever 'ave you mixed yourself up with this fish trade for? If you'd set up a millinery business in the West End now, that would 'ave been more reasonable."

She looked at him keenly, and laughed oddly.

"You just wait a bit," she recommended.

The little shop was mean enough, having only the scarcest apology for a marble slab; but the sitting-room behind was furnished almost luxuriously. The difference was remarkable, and Timothy Nobbs was quite taken aback by it.

"Why, if the outlook were a bit better, it might almost be one of her ladyship's own private sitting-rooms," he remarked, wondering, with mouth agape, at the richness of the carpet, and at the blue brocade of the window curtains, and of the chair upholstery. "Why, these chairs and things must have cost a perfect heap of money! And you don't mean to say as you're going in and out between this room and the shop, and going to lay fishy ands on them silk curtains and cushions! Bah! I never could endure the smell of fish."

Miss Louise, ex-lady's maid, laughed her curious little significant laugh again. She gave no reply to his amazed words, but invited him silently to seat himself at the table, where a most dainty-looking early dinner was set out. Further misgivings came to the thrifty butler when the removal of a shining dish cover revealed to his astonished gaze a couple of roast chickens.

"And where do you think the money's coming from to keep this sort of thing going, year in, year out?" he inquired, with some alarm in his tone. He was reflecting inwardly that a recklessly extravagant wife might be anything but a blessing to him in his declining years. "It's all very well to have 'undreds of pounds," he proceeded in a tone of warning. "But even 'undreds of pounds don't last for ever and—— Bless my soul, what's that?"

A double knock had sounded at the front door. His bride-elect answered it in person, and presently returned to the sitting-room with a telegram, which she opened and read and then put in her pocket. Timothy Nobbs, being by nature inquisitive, felt resentful at her omission to tell him what the evidently important message had been about.

"You leave money matters to me," she was saying meanwhile reassuringly. "Don't you think we're going to depend on the shop. I'm not such a fool as that. I've got other and better sources of income. Now that I've left ladies' service for ever, I may as well tell you that I've found out a secret of Lady Dare's which she's paying me to keep dark. It's always been my way in service to find out whatever secrets my ladies have had and then make them hand over the money so that I should keep my tongue quiet. Whenever I've got a place with a lady who hadn't any secret, I used to give her notice at the end of the first quarter and try for better luck next time. I've got half a dozen paying me so much a year for not letting their cats out of the bag. Lady Dare makes a seventh. She's arranged to pay me five hundred a year from now till she dies—or I die—and—"

"Five hundred a year!" cried Timothy aghast. In the amazement which overwhelmed him, he was indifferent to a second double knock at the street door. "Five hundred a year! Why, it's wicked—wicked! And if that's true, what are you setting up any shop at all for? If you've got so little conscience that you can take the money, why, you might as well live on it straight off, without trying to sell fish. But in any case I ain't going to make you Mrs. Nobbs. I won't marry a woman that isn't respectable, and a woman that lives on blackmail hasn't got an ounce of respectability about 'er. I've felt all along that you'd been 'aving some nasty dealings with 'er ladyship, but I never thought as you'd be 'eartless enough and fury enough to keep it up continuously like this."

He had risen from his seat at the table and was now making the mortifying discovery that his last remarks had been addressed to an empty room. His bride-elect had departed to answer the front door knock, and was now returning with a second telegram in her hand. The elderly and dignified lover, who had just repudiated her in her absence, was on the point of dauntlessly repeating his scornful remarks plainly and straightly before her face, when he was once more interrupted from the outside.

This time the interruption was caused by the entrance of a stranger—a young man, hardly, indeed, more than a boy, who advanced into the room as if he were familiar with it. The dignified Timothy, annoyed with this cool intrusion at so inconvenient a moment, stared at him in the manner of one who would be only too well pleased to be given an opportunity of starting a quarrel. And then suddenly the self-important face and free and easy manner of a man-servant out for the day, changed into the mask-like countenance and the well-trained and respectfully dignified bearing of the manservant in the house of his service. Yet his eyes showed joy as well as wonder, and he took a step towards the boyish-looking stranger.

"Master Ronald!" he cried, in a voice that shook a little with genuine devotion. "Master Ronald! Don't you know Timothy Nobbs—Nobbs, the butler?"

Did the young fellow whom he thus addressed not recognise him? Apparently he recognised him only too well, for he turned instantly and was out of the house before the elderly servant had had time to recover his surprise, or to decide in his own mind whether or not he might dare to follow his master's missing and dishonored son and heir whom he had thus unexpectedly encountered.

Another moment, however, and the necessity for action had become clear to him. Without lingering then to express to his astonished lady love his opinion of the enormity of her conduct, and the eternal breach between them which must consequently result, he dashed out of the room and the shop and was in the street in a moment, looking about with his short-sighted old eyes for that handsome, though sorely changed, young son of his master and mistress, whose bringing home would, to the mother at least, have been as the coming home of the prodigal in the old Bible story.

But Ronald Dare was no longer in sight. Anxious, and full of sorrow for having so awkwardly let him go, the sober butler recovered his youth again, so far as his legs went, and positively ran from one end to the other of the mean and narrow byestreet, looking for the disgraced but still precious human treasure whom he would have been so proud to persuade to come back to his home, and there to turn to a better life. His search was vain, however, and at the end of half an hour, during which he had prosecuted his difficult quest in many different directions, he turned his footsteps sadly back towards the fish shop in order to have the necessary last interview with his unsatisfactory betrothed.

He wondered once as he went whether it would not be as well to put off saying what he wanted to say to her for the good reason of being able to go there again in order to watch for Ronald Dare. For, whether or not Timothy Nobbs was a fool, as his plighted Louise had so often declared him to be, he had been wise enough to see by the mere manner of his young master's entrance into the little parlor behind the shop that the visit was not a casual one, nor by any means the first which the young gentleman had made to the premises. Indeed, young Mr. Dare, deserter and spendthrift, had walked into the parlor as freely as if it had been his own private sitting-room. What could this mean? Since to all seeming he was not a lodger here, with what object could he have gone there so frequently? Thus unwontedly perplexed, the stolid and sober Timothy found it difficult to make up his mind as to what course of action he should take. He had certainly decided that all question that he was not going to ally himself matrimonially with his lady's erstwhile maid, the too volatile and unscrupulous Louise. At this moment, the very thought of her snaky little smooth black head revolted him. "Adder!" he called her under his breath. But did wisdom lie in telling her at once of his new disgust for her, or in waiting a little to see what might happen?

As he neared the door of the shop he saw a telegraph boy walking away from it and another standing at it in the act of delivering the brickered missive of which he was the bearer.

"More telegrams!" Timothy Nobbs felt quite taken aback. Customers in the fish business must be queer people, he thought; of course, if a large number of them habitually sent their orders by telegram it did not matter much that the shop was in a dirty, out of the way alley, down which nobody passed. Still, it was very curious. Canningtown customers sending telegraphic orders! In spite of himself he was beginning to feel suspicious. He had not yet investigated the whole of this building of which he was still supposed to be destined master. He told himself that whatever happened between him and the snaky-headed young woman whom he was going to jilt, he would manage somehow to go all over the house before finally leaving to catch his train back to Guildford and The Uplands.

"When I come to think of it, I don't believe that them telegrams is about fish at all," he said to himself reflectively as he crossed the grimy threshold. The griminess of door and floor and walls was indeed quite startling when one came to think of the luxurious furnishings of the sitting-room at the back of the shop. The suspicious butler went on talking to himself the while he cast an all-embracing look round the little shop. "It's only gentry that could afford to waste money in telegraphing for what they want," he told himself sagely, "and she aven't got nothing 'ere that the gentry would want—no turbot, no soles, no red mullet, no salmon; nothing but bloaters and kippers and stale 'errings, and one dried addick. People don't send telegrams for dried addick and bloaters."

He went into the charming little sitting-room behind. She, whom until half an hour ago he had regarded as his bride-elect, was not there. In spite of his short-sightedness, he caught sight of an open telegram under one of the chairs; no doubt it had fluttered there from her hand, or been swept there by the trailing folds of her extremely fashionable skirt. He stooped, picked it up, and read it, or rather tried to read it; it was addressed simply to "Louise," and the message it contained consisted only of one quite incomprehensible word.

Bulletins From Seed Branch, Ottawa.

Elevator Screenings.

Screenings from the terminal elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur are composed of shrunken and broken kernels of wheat, oats, barley and flax with a varying proportion of different kinds of weed seeds. An eighth ounce of screenings which had been ground as chopped feed was found to contain 233 noxious and 451 other weed seeds. But when the smaller weed seeds have been removed it is not difficult to destroy by grinding the vitality of nearly all those remaining. The smaller weed seeds, comprising from 20 to 40 per cent of the whole, are not completely ground by ordinary mills and some of them are believed to be decidedly unwholesome. When graded to remove these smaller harmful seeds and the balance finely ground, screenings make a cheap and nutritious stock feed.

Weed Seeds in Feed.

Bran, shorts and chop feeds are sometimes contaminated by ground screenings which are mixed with them in some of the flour mills. Of 396 samples collected throughout Canada in 1913 by the Inland Revenue Department 140 contained an average of 87 noxious weed seeds per pound, and only 144 of the samples were entirely free from vital weed seeds. One sample of chopped feed contained 1104 noxious weed seeds per pound. Bulletin No. 254 of the Inland Revenue Department gives the names and addresses of the manufacturers and the quality of their mill feeds.

Turnip Seed Situation.

Turnips and other roots occupied 175,000 acres in Canada in 1914 and yielded 69,003,000 bushels valued at $16,934,000. Turnip seed imported into Canada for the year ended March 31, 1914 follows:

From	Qty., lbs.	Value
United Kingdom	1,123,958	$95,471
United States	62,818	5,022
France	120,687	10,454
Holland	224,162	16,855
Other Countries	39,698	3,071
Total	1,577,323	$130,874

There is good reason to believe that a part of the turnip seed coming to Canada from the United Kingdom had been grown under contract on the continent. The prospective scarcity of labor and the need for food production leaves open to speculation the proportion of seed supplies available from Europe for use in Canada in 1916.

Sow the Best Variety.

The 1913 investigation into the condition of seed grain and flax actually being used on Canadian farms showed that the variety name of 34 per cent. of the 2065 samples taken was not known by the farmers. Varities of cereal crops differ in time of maturity, strength of straw, freedom from disease, yield, per cent. of hull in oats and hardness in wheats. The three highest yields of oats obtained at each Dominion Experiment Station in 1912 averaged 33¼ bushels more per acre than the three lowest. Experiments have shown that four or five varieties of oats cover all the conditions of Canada yet forty farmers in one district were found growing seventeen different varieties. Each district should grow only the variety of crop best suited to soil, climate and markets. The variety might be chosen on the advice of the nearest Experiment Station.

SIR HERBERT S. HOLT.

The Most Unpretentious Big Millionaire in Canada.

Sir Herbert S. Holt, of Montreal, recently honored with a knighthood, is said to be the most modest and retiring of Canada's millionaires. He is one of the biggest power and transportation men in the Dominion, but he doesn't go in for social or club life of any kind and is personally known to very few people.

Sir Herbert Holt came to Canada in 1875 as a nineteen-year-old immigrant from Ireland. He had been given a training in mathematics and engineering at Trinity College, Dublin and he was given a job by James Ross, of Montreal, on the Victoria Railway, a crude little lumbering line, extending north from Lindsay into the forests of Haliburton. Young Holt made himself very useful, and when Ross moved to Toronto as superintendent of the Credit Valley Railway, later absorbed by the C.P.R., he brought Holt with him. The young engineer had a good deal to do with the construction of its various extensions. In 1883 James Ross moved again—going to the West as superintendent of construction on the prairie division of the C.P.R.—and again he took young Holt with him.

Power His Monument.

About the same time William Mackenzie and D. D. Mann went West. Holt soon saw that there was more money in the contracting business than in working on salary as an engineer, and he spent seven years in that business, being all the time more or less in touch with Mackenzie, Mann and Ross. Returning to Montreal, he directed his energies to getting control of that city's power and light facilities. He first bought out the old Montreal gas company. Then he acquired the Royal Electric Company, and by degrees buying out competing companies or crushing them, he evolved the present Montreal Light, Heat, and Power Company with its seventeen million dollar capital and its almost absolute monopoly in the city and district of Montreal.

Sir H. S. Holt.

Montreal Power is the monument H. S. Holt has reared to his prowess as a financier. He knows all about that company and its equipment. He is the company's own resident engineer, and has traveled all over the world improving his knowledge of electrical engineering problems.

He is also a bank president, being head of the Royal Bank. By the way he has the unique distinction of having been president of two banks for he was the first president of the ill-fated Sovereign Bank, and held that office for three years. Sir Herbert is a director of the C.P.R. and is a liberal investor in stocks of any kind that have a basis of industrialism. He is one of the biggest of Montreal's financial magnates—one of the inner circle. Personally he is also a big man. He is rather better than six feet in height, and his frame is powerful and well knit—that of a man who lived his early life out doors and was very much at home there.

There is nothing of the mixer about this new Montreal knight. He spends most of his time between his house on Stanley Street and his office in the Power Building on Craig Street. Usually he makes a trip across the Atlantic once a year, but the rest of the time he lives quiet at home. He doesn't care for clubs and has few intimates.

Edwardsburg "Crown Brand" Corn Syrup

POUR IT ON PORRIDGE

YOU can't imagine how delicious a dish of Oatmeal Porridge becomes when it is sweetened with "Crown Brand" Corn Syrup.

Have it for breakfast to-morrow—watch the kiddies' eyes sparkle with the first spoonful—see how they come for 'more'.

Much cheaper than cream and sugar—better for the children, too.

Spread the Bread with "Crown Brand"—serve it on Pancakes and Hot Biscuits, on Blanc Mange and Baked Apples—use it for Candy-Making

"LILY WHITE" is a pure white Corn Syrup, more delicate in flavor than "Crown Brand". You may prefer it.

FRENCH SAVED BRITISH.

They Were Stragglers Who Had Indulged in Too Much Wine.

One of the few war subjects which has not been exaggerated is the really amazing friendship which has sprung up between the soldiers of the allied armies. If you consider that they cannot understand a word of each other's language, you might imagine that real intimacy were no more than a dream. Such is not the case. Mr. Atkins and M. Piou-Piou have become actual and real friends, and to see them strolling along in liberty hours, arm in arm and talking volubly, is a liberal education in the possibilities of human nature, writes O. M. Hueffer.

One incident which the writer personally witnessed "somewhere near the front," as the war correspondents say, and which speaks volumes for the friendship of the allied private soldiers must be prefaced by the statement that some 40 per cent of the British troops at present at the front are total abstainers. I happened to be walking across the market place of the little town with a staff officer of the British. Just in our way were, I suppose, a couple of hundred French privates. As we came up to them they fell away before us in a manner altogether incomprehensible, backing toward the nearest wall, keeping their faces always towards us, and saluting continually with a surprising enthusiasm. I asked the colonel what he supposed it meant. He replied, with raised eyebrows, that it was altogether incomprehensible.

Three minutes later, having left the colonel at the door of his headquarters, I discovered the key of the mystery. Three British stragglers, who had lost their battalions and were looking for them had wandered into the town. They had come far, and on the way the peasantry, who by this time positively adore "les Anglishes," had offered them the wine which was red. Their French comrades, recognizing their condition, had flocked together to protect them from any possible punishment at the hands of the British officers—whence the manoeuvring in the market-place.

The pains which those French soldiers took subsequently to insure the safety of their charges was a lesson in humanity. After long consultation they decided that the village church was the best place of sanctuary, and accordingly they led them there, procured large trusses of straw, and left them to sleep off their "fatigue," as one of the Frenchmen put it. Two of the culprits proved perfectly amenable and went quietly to sleep. The third, of more heroic mold, no sooner found himself abandoned, than he arose swiftly to his feet, left the church, and wandered again through the market-place, hinting by signs to the passers-by that he was still athirst.

His watchful French protectors rose to the occasion, led him again to the sanctuary, and again put him to bed. Two minutes later he was out again, recommencing his tour of the market-place. I do not think I am exaggerating if I say that this performance was gone through ten times, with unvarying patience on the part of the Frenchmen, before the infantryman-errant was at last permitted to go to sleep. Even then guardian angels in red breeches waited outside another quarter of an hour to make sure that he should not change his mind.

The writer could instance a hundred cases within his own personal knowledge where the instincts of our common humanity have triumphed over the red bestiality of war, from an actual set-to at fisticuffs between a Bavarian and one of the West Surreys in the space between the trenches, with both armies as enthusiastic spectators, to a case of which I was told by an eye-witness, when an Englishman and a German both sacrificed their lives unavailingly, as it proved, to save that of a French peasant boy who had somehow wandered into the very middle of the fight.

Mr John Caldwell held a very successful wood bee on Thursday of last week.

Mr Bert Atkinson has been under the weather during the past week with a severe cold.

Mr G R Brown met with a painful accident to his arm while skating one night last week. We would suggest that George get an arm support for skating in the future. A lady, for instance, would do nicely.

A number of the young folks took in the dance at Mr Dune Currie's on Friday evening of last week.

We notice lately by the press that the relationship between the Canadians and Americans is getting more strained every day. It seems too bad that the old and cherished ideals of both countries cannot be maintained. Our sentiment should be a good deal stronger than our greed. We should always try to live on good terms with our neighbors to the south. We should trade with them and co-operate with them. In a social way they should be our treasured friends, so that if they wanted to borrow our preserving kettle they would be able to get it, for some day we might want the use of their step-ladder. A good deal better, we would imagine, than quarrelling over the trivial matters that seem to engross the minds of people in the two countries to-day. There are thousands who are shouting loyalty and united Canada until nothing else can be heard, and at the same time they are pushing their schemes for the domination of the whole Dominion by the loyalty cry of made in Canada, which is certainly a fine motto and which should be marked on all goods that are worthy. But if the consumer is to pay from one-quarter to one-third more for an article so labelled it is anything but loyalty for him to purchase the article. Any man who would impose a tax on his own neighbor for his own gain—a tax which causes resentment, which is in itself unjust—destroys that good feeling which is essential to national unity. The real traitor in a land is the man who through gross selfishness works injustice to his fellow man.

The farmers around here are beginning to see rural delivery in the near future. Shipments of boxes are coming from time to time so that it is expected that the mail routes will be in operation by the last of April.

D J McLean, assistant P O inspector, was here a few days ago with Col Hugh Clark, M P, discussing rural mail with the ratepayers of Bruce. Reeve Johnson was chairman, and in opening the meeting explained that it was an error to suppose that the council was opposed to rural mail. They were, however, desirous of keeping on the stage, if possible, and he had some objection to the routes as at present laid. Ex-reeve Meahinney also spoke in the same strain, and brought to the attention of Mr McLean some complaints against the rural mail service now in operation on his concession. Mr McLean pointed out that the route proposed would give Bruce To the very best service possible. It would bring up to Tiverton early in the morning the mail, including the evening papers, from Kincardine. At noon a courier would leave Port Elgin as soon as possible carrying that day's morning papers and other mails to North Bruce, Underwood and Tiverton. He showed to the satisfaction of all that their objections were based upon misunderstanding of the routes. Mr Mewhinney said that the establishment of a rural mail service would mean the ruin of small places like Underwood, to which Mr McLean replied that the farmers had petitioned for it and were getting it in other places. Geo Baker, J H Struthers, James McKenzie, C S Woods and others spoke. The meeting agreed that if the stage could not be continued with rural mail that the services as laid out are satisfactory. Mr McLean said that to doubt the stage was an advantage in carrying parcels, but that the department was paying only for carrying mail and that the other was a "side line," and that there was no objection to the rural mail couriers doing the same.

CHESLEY

Last Thursday Jas Kirkwood sold his farm of 114 acres on 13th con of Biant to Gottlieb Kluges of Sullivan Tp for $7300 which is $66 per acre.

For the past two weeks the big factory firm of Krug Bros & Co has been running six days a week, eight hours a day. The members of the firm are delighted that orders are coming in so fast by mail and from their travellers that they expect to run the full ten hours within the next month. It means a great deal to the workingmen and business people in a factory town when employment is given every week day and the local situation in regard to hard times has been relieved. No people in town are better pleased with the brighter outlook for the workingmen than the members of the Krug firm.

G N Griffith, manager of Canada Beds, returned on Saturday night from Montreal where he got a signed order from Col. Bertram, chairman of the shell committee, for 25,000 eighteen stroke No 111 shrapnel. The Dominion Government supplies the shell and bullets and they are loaded here with the exception of the time fuse, which are put in at Woolwich, England. The job is worth about $100,000.00 and will take till October 1st to complete. Mr Griffin, manager of Canada Beds, deserves credit for landing such a big order when so many foundries are after orders. The price at which the shells are to be manufactured is set by the Government. Mr Griffin is in Toronto ordering the special machinery for the manufacture of these shells, the cost of which will be, approximately, $12,000. Two shifts of 45 men each will be employed for 12 hours each, making work for 90 men. There will be work for everybody and no man need go idle in this town or community because preference will be given to the local workingmen. The manufacture of shrapnel will begin about March 1st but several hands will be employed before that time getting the machinery into place. There are about 276 bullets in each shell and when they explode there is destruction on all sides. Mr Griffin found that it helped him to secure the order when he pointed out that more shells had been shipped from Chesley than from any other place of its size in Canada.—Enterprise.

WALKERTON

The membership of Knox church is 517. According to reports given at the annual meeting the congregating raised during 1914 the sum of $3556.96 for ordinary revenue, $2225 34 for missions, and the women's missionary society gathered in addition $306.61.

The members of the Sons of Scotland held their annual supper on Monday night, Jan. 25th, Burns' Anniversary. A stirring patriotic address was given by Bro. Hugh McKerracher, who lately returned from Scotland.

John Leisure, who travelled under the alias of John Langton, and who was the culprit that escaped from County Constable Mills by jumping out of a train window near Dubbinton last December while being conveyed from Tara to the Walkerton jail to await trial before the County Judge for stealing a team of horses and other articles from his employer, Wm. Trelford of Arran Tp., was re-captured by the Chief of Police at Peterboro on Tuesday of last week and was brought to Walkerton on Wednesday night by Constable Mills, who went down and brought the transgressor handcuffed to the Bruce capital, where he was met by Bailiff Biggs, and the two officers escorted him to the County jail, the prisoner having boasted leaving Peterborough that Mills would never succeed in placing him in Walkerton cells. Besides admitting the theft in Arran he also confessed to stealing a horse and cutter from D J Matthews at Chatsworth on Dec. 3rd, the mysterious disappearance of this outfit having caused much speculation among the authorities there. On being arraigned before Judge Klein here on Saturday and admitting his guilt, he pleaded strongly for leniency on the ground that he had only been married six months and was leaving a sorrowing young wife in dire straits. The Judge listened to his spiel and closed the drama by sentencing him to one year in the Central Prison, Toronto.

Provincial Detective Boyd arrived here on Monday night with a prisoner named Oliver Cole of Southampton, who was arrested in Rodney on a charge of defrauding Mrs John Donald, a widow woman of Southampton, out of $209.00. The woman whose son, John, was removed from the Walkerton jail to the London asylum, is stated to have handed over to Cole $209 last May to get her son out of the asylum. In person in the union Cole is said to have represented to the asylum that he was a cousin of the lunatic and was about to place him in a good home out west. On the inmate being handed over to him he returned with his charge to Southampton. As the crazy one had previously become a nuisance by following girls about the street, his entry again on the scene was the cause of some alarm. After enjoying his liberty for a time Donald is stated to have again acted strange, and on being nabbed by the authorities was returned to the asylum. At the Fall Assizes in Walkerton last fall, Lawyer Tucker of Owen Sound intimated to Constable Briggs that he would like him to effect Cole's arrest, and the local sleuth started to work on the case with the result that he was later able to wire up the authorities on Cole's whereabouts and secure his apprehension. The prisoner's past record is none too savory a one, he being in the Walkerton jail in connection with the famous election protest against the return of C M Bowman of Southampton, Liberal, and which resulted in Cole being fined $50 by Judge Barrett in Feb. 1905 for inciting a witness to give false evidence in favor of the Liberals at the election trial. The prisoner will appear before Magistrate Talton here on Feb. 4th on the charge of defrauding the Southampton widow.

AN IMPORTANT ARREST

Last week High Constable Ward arrested Herbert Boyd at Big Bay, who was wanted in Niagara Falls, N Y, where he is accused of having stolen $2,200 from the I O O F while he was treasurer of that institution. About 19 years ago Boyd left Big Bay, where he was born and struck out to make his fortune, and now at the age of 38 he will probably go into the penitentiary where he will have plenty of time for reflection. He was a good penman, pretty smooth, and in some way worked into the good graces of the local order of Oddfellows. He was appointed treasurer, but being a boozer he was fired, and another man was asked to take his place. This man declined to do so until an audit of the books had been made and the audit showed a shortage of $2,200 last year. In the meantime Boyd had skipped out and notices were sent broadcast to every constable in Ontario. Bob Ward got one, he heard that a man answering the description was in Big Bay, so he proceeded there, and found the bird he wanted enjoying himself at a game of cards. "Hello, Herb," said Ward. "You have the advantage of me," replied Boyd, whereupon Ward told him that he had a warrant for his arrest. The man admitted his guilt, was brought to Wiarton, and remained in the cooler here until a detective from Niagara came and claimed him. He is a smooth one, said the detective, and will probably get five years.—Wiarton Record.

Valuable Information for the Travelling Public

Attention is called to excellent night service from Toronto to Montreal and Ottawa via Canadian Pacific. Train No. 22 leaving Toronto Union Station at 11.40 p.m. daily, carries electric lighted sleepers, compartment observation car from Toronto to Montreal, and Toronto to Ottawa. This train runs via Lake Ontario Shore line, due Montreal 8.55 a.m. daily, the Ottawa sleeper arriving in Ottawa 7.25 a.m. daily. Smoking is permitted in the lounge or observation room of the Buffet Library Observation Compartment Car Toronto to Montreal, and arrangements have been made whereby porters on this car will press clothes for passengers at very reasonable charges.

Being the last train from Toronto for Montreal and Ottawa, it gives the travelling public the opportunity of spending the entire evening with their families, or enables them to attend the theatre and other places of amusement, and still have plenty of time to take the train. Sleepers are placed for occupancy at 10.00 p.m. at Toronto Union Station, enabling passengers who so desire to retire at that time.

Dining Car is attached at Smiths Falls every morning, serving breakfast into Montreal, so that business men may proceed direct to their offices or appointments immediately on arrival.

The Canadian Pacific operates a high class passenger train from North Toronto station at 10.00 p.m. daily, carrying standard electric lighted sleepers and compartment car for Montreal and sleeper Toronto to Ottawa. Train is due Montreal 7.35 a.m. daily, and Ottawa car reaches that point at 7.25 a.m. daily.

A solid night train is also operated from Toronto Union Station to Ottawa leaving Toronto 10.30 p.m. daily, this train carrying standard electric lighted sleepers and compartment car, arriving Ottawa 7.25 a.m. daily. Carries from Smith Falls to Ottawa the standard sleepers for that point, leaving North Toronto at 10.30 p.m., and the standard sleepers leaving Toronto Union Station at 11.40 p.m. daily, so that Ottawa passengers may take their choice of either one of these three trains, and reach Ottawa at exactly the same time.

The Canadian limited No. 2 via Lake Ontario shore line route leaves Toronto daily 9.00 a.m. for Montreal, connection at Smith Falls for Ottawa, stopping at important places, carrying observation parlor car, dining car, and first and second class coaches.

Particulars from any Canadian Pacific Ticket Agent, or write M. G. Murphy, District Passenger Agent, Toronto.

CRAWFORD—ROBB

A pretty wedding was solemnized on Wednesday evening, Feb 3rd, at five o'clock at the home of Mrs Wm Robb, Williscroft, when her daughter, Pearl Emma, became the bride of Mr Harold Ernest Crawford, of Swan Lake, Man. Rev R J McEwen, of Paisley, performed the ceremony in the presence of a large number of friends. The house was prettily decorated for the event with evergreens and roses. The bride was given away by her brother, Mr Alexander Robb, and took her place under a beautiful arch decorated with white ribbon, wedding bells and horseshoes. The bride wore a beautiful gown of ivory duchess satin with silk embroidery overdress and embroidered tulle veil caught up with orange blossoms, and carried a bible. Miss Olive Robb, sister of the bride, played the wedding march and wore a dress of shadow lace over pale blue silk. The groom's gift to the bride was a piano, and to the organist a ring. After the ceremony the guests to the number of about fifty sat down to a grand dinner equal to the occasion. Mr and Mrs Crawford after a brief visit to friends here will leave for their home in Swan Lake, Man.

—Miss A K Scott of Arthur is visiting her aunt, Mrs D McKenzie.

—Hanover will have one hotel less after May 1st, the town council having passed a by-law cutting the number from four to three. Efforts were made to have the licenses reduced to two, but the council declined to follow such drastic measures at present.

—No action is taken upon anonymous complaints or charges of law breaking received by the Paisley police or other authorities. Some person must assume responsibility in such cases. —French educational leaders of Quebec province are excitedly agitating for the maintenance of the French language in Ontario schools, claiming that French as well as English is the official language of Canada, and was so fixed in the compact of Confederation. This agitation is being met with the argument that under the British North American Act education was committed to the provinces and every province was to have any school system it pleased only that Ontario and Quebec were to have separate schools for their minorities. French is not an official language of any provincial government outside of Quebec. Ontario has a perfect right to have as much or as little French as it chooses, either as a medium or as a subject of study. Quebec has no more right to interfere with Ontario in this respect than Ontario has to interfere with Quebec.

—Brant Township council for 1915 is said to be composed, with one exception, of men who do not wear upon their brows the adorning jewel of consistency. At their first meeting of the year the council decided to transfer the municipal funds and account from the Bank of Commerce in Walkerton to the Royal Bank in Elmwood, because the latter institution pays taxes in the township, while the other does not. Then at the second meeting they appointed as assessor Mr. John Blerworth of Bentinck Tp., although four Brant men, Messrs. Sid Parker, George Piddis, John Connolly and James Ormiston, were also applicants for the position. From what can be learned Blerworth is not as well qualified to fill the position as some of the others, and is not doing it any cheaper than the others would, so it is a puzzler to find reasons for the move. Perhaps the council can enlighten their constituents upon the subject, and they are yet to be heard from.

Hints for the Home

Tested Recipes.

Lemon Snaps.—One cup of butter and two of sugar beaten to a foamy cream. Add to this two eggs and the grated rind of one large lemon with its juice. A scant teaspoonful of soda dissolved in two tablespoonfuls of sweet milk. Knead very stiff with flour, roll out very thin, cut out in shapes with tin cutter and bake in quick oven.

Rice Cake, Yokohama.—Thoroughly wash and drain four ounces of rice. Place in an enamelled saucepan with a pint of milk, a saltspoonful of salt, half a teaspoonful of vanilla, and let boil for 45 minutes, lightly mixing at bottom with a wooden spoon once in a while. Remove to a table, add two tablespoonfuls of sugar, two tablespoonfuls of cream or milk, a whole egg, the yolk of another and stir thoroughly. Line a pie plate with some puff paste. Pour rice into the plate, neatly smooth surface and set in oven for 25 minutes.

Home-made Sausage.—Take of young lean pork one and one-third pounds of tenderloin, the rest any lean cut, four pounds, and fat, two pounds; put it through a sausage grinder twice, perhaps three times, until of the desired fineness. Use for each pound of meat one teaspoonful of powdered dried leaf sage, one teaspoonful of salt, one-third teaspoonful of pepper and one-third of a nutmeg; nutmeg may be omitted if preferred. A quantity of sausage may be made at a time and preserved for regular use if one has a cold storeroom. It should be placed in jars and covered an inch thick with melted lard, which will preserve it.

Vassar Cakes. These little bites are cornmeal hoe-cakes, served hot and eaten with strained honey, brown sugar, or molasses. But the hoe has nothing to do with them; a batter is made with cornmeal and cold water, seasoned only with salt. The batter must be so thin that it literally pours from a tablespoon, one of which is put at a time on a hot iron griddle for the cake. The usual griddle holds three or four cakes, and as soon as these cook they are thinly coated with butter and served on hot plates. The sugar, honey or molasses is put on the table.

Lemon Pudding.—Put two ounces of butter in a saucepan and when melted stir in slowly one tablespoonful of flour and one tablespoonful of cornmeal. When the ingredients form a thick paste, add quickly one pint of milk and stir until the mixture has boiled and thickened. Remove from the stove and add three rounding tablespoonfuls of sugar, the grated rind of one large lemon and one tablespoonful of vanilla. Fold in the yolks of two eggs which have been beaten previously and one tablespoonful of finely chopped candied lemon peel. Add one pinch of salt to the whites of the eggs and whisk to a stiff froth. When the pudding is cold add the whites of the eggs and the juice of the lemon. Cover with a thick puff paste, brown in a medium oven and serve with cream.

Scotch Bun.—Take 1½ breakfastfuls of flour, ¾ lb. butter, 1 teaspoonful of baking powder. Mix these with sufficient water to form a dough, roll out, grease the inside of a large cake tin, and line neatly with the paste, reserving a piece for the top of the bun. Filling: 1 lb of flour, ¼ lb. sugar, 2 lbs. stoned raisins, 2 lbs. currants, ½ lb candied orange peel, ½ teaspoonful black pepper, one teaspoonful carbonate of soda, ¼ lb. almonds, blanched and chopped, ½ oz. each of ginger and cinnamon, one teaspoonful cream of tartar and a small breakfastcupful of milk, or enough to barely moisten all. Mix thoroughly and put in the pastelined tin and cover with paste. Prick all over with a fork, brush over with egg, and bake about 2½ hours.

Useful Hints.

To help out a meatless meal use cream soups or dishes which include cheese, beans or eggs.

Rag rugs made of cotton wash well, are inexpensive and are often just the thing for the kitchen.

The bone should be left in a roast; it will help to keep the juice in and will add flavor and sweetness.

If the aluminum cooking utensils turn black, try boiling tomato parings in them and they will brighten.

It is best not to serve the same dish twice a week unless it be a vegetable, as everyone likes variety.

When making pastry use the rolling pin well. Measure all ingredients accurately; never guess at quantities.

One secret of a warm house is having all the living room windows facing the south and the north windows double sashed.

When baking fish place on the top of it some thin slices of salt pork. This bastes the fish and makes the flavor better.

When nailing down a carpet after the floor has been scrubbed be sure that the floor is quite dry, or the nails will rust and injure the carpet.

Alum is very useful in the home, and there is nothing better for mending broken dishes or a lamp when it is loose in the socket than alum melted and used while hot.

To make shabby oilcloth look new, give it a thin coat of varnish, let it dry, then give it a second coat, which will be found better than one heavy coat.

Doughnuts to be perfect should be cut out before putting the fat on to heat. To make them puffy, keep the kettle covered in which they are frying.

Save all odd bits of cheese, and when they are dry grate them and put the grated cheese in a glass jar to use for various cooked dishes of vegetables and macaroni.

After you have used all the ham that will cut nicely from the bone, and after chipping the remaining meat for frizzled ham, boil the bone with cabbage.

Tin is a great saving of the expense of equipping a kitchen, if one wishes the outlay to be as small as possible. But it should be the thickly coated kind.

Dresses that have been laid away in drawers for some time often become very creased. Hang them in front of the fire for a while and the creases will disappear.

There is probably more extravagance in the average home in the way of wasted light than any other one item in the whole category of household expenses, for so few people remember to turn out the lights not in use.

When cutting cured hams that you do not wish to use up at once, they can be kept fresh and sweet for a long time by spreading fresh lard over the newly cut surface. Always begin cutting at the end of the ham, having a saw for the bone, and there will be no waste whatever.

New flannel should always be shrunk before it is made into garments. Wash it entirely by itself in hot water, as warm as the hand can bear. The soap should be rubbed to a lather in the water, or else the flannel may become hard. Use two warm waters. Then rinse in a third in which only a little soap has been dissolved, also a little indigo blue. Wring and shake the flannel well, and while it is drying shake, stretch and turn it several times.

BEST FED ARMY IN HISTORY.

The British Army Is Well Supplied With Food.

Dr. F. M. Sandwith, chairman of the County of London branch of the British Red Cross Society, delivering the first of a series of three Chadwick lectures on "War and Disease at the Lecture Hall of the Royal Society of Arts, London, lately, contrasted with former times, the present excellent condition of health in the British Army, which had been brought about, he said, by the splendid body of men in the Royal Army Medical Corps. Just as the issues in the present war were greater than ever before, so at least our knowledge was based to-day on sounder principles and the armies facing each other were better equipped, better instructed, and better fitted to endure the hardships of a long and bitter struggle than ever before. Taking the average of recent wars fought on land, out of every 100 deaths 20 had been due to wounds and 80 to disease. It was hard to believe that we would ever learn the lesson entirely that courage and goodwill were unable by themselves to carry us through when we were pitted against armies trained and equipped as the enemy was. We had learned a go-I deal and profited by some of our worst blunders in the past, and we might congratulate those who were responsible on the excellent clothing and general equipment of the regular army, for the very good food which was supplied to them, and the training they had received. Ours was said to be the army best supplied with food since the world began.

CONUNDRUMS.

Why are tall people the laziest?—Because they are always the longest in bed.

Why is an industrious tailor never at home?—Because he is always cutting out.

My first is a preposition, my second a composition, my third an acquisition—Fortune.

Why is an officer encamped like a person very attentive to the solution of this conundrum?—Because he is in-tent.

Where you place your child is my first; what you make your child is my second, and a Court ornament is my whole—Lap-pet.

Why is a lady who is presented with tickets for ten balls like a lawyer or a physician?—Because she is paid for at-ten-dances.

My first is to be seen in the sky, my second conquers kings and queens, and my whole is what I would offer to a friend in distress—Sol-ace.

What kind of hunting is that in which neither horses nor hounds are used in the pursuit of game which is usually of the feminine gender?—Fortune-hunting.

Mrs. Susan Buckles, who died recently near Edinburg, Ill., at the age of 92, had never attended a motion-picture show, a circus or a theatre and had never ridden on a train or street car.

ACTIVITIES OF WOMEN

London now has an official police woman.

Illinois pays out $112,030 a year in mothers' pensions.

There are over 1,000 women on the British Medical Register.

Women are being employed to take moving pictures of war scenes in France.

Over 8,000 of New York's 15,000 working women received less than $6.50 a week last year.

The Countess Lonyay, a daughter of Leopold of Belgium, and once a future Empress of Austria, is now a Red Cross nurse.

Mme. Bakhemeteff, wife of the Russian ambassador to the United States, has one of the finest collection of pearls in the world.

Dr. Mary Crawford, who has been assigned to the operating-room in the American hospital in Paris, is the only woman physician in the hospital.

Fire Commissioner Adamson of New York has appointed Mrs. Olive F. Shepherd as a fire inspector in the bureau of fire protection at a salary of $1,200 a year.

Twenty-four per cent. of nearly 6,000 women and children employed in stores, laundries, factories and telephone exchanges in New Orleans receive an average wage of less than $4 per week.

Miss Anne Morgan, a daughter of the late J. Pierpont Morgan, will be awarded the grand medal of the National Institute of Social Sciences, being equivalent to the grand cross of the French Legion of Honor.

Mrs. Lorillard Spencer and Miss Katherine Buffin of New York, who recently returned from the Philippines, are the first white women who ever penetrated the mountain fastnesses in which the savage Moros make their homes. Both women spent a whole year among the tribes and came back unharmed.

USING VERY DEADLY SHELLS.

Germans Prepare Explosive That Causes Intense Suffering.

Sir William Ramsay, noted scientist and frequent contributor to the New York American, writes to the London Times:

"I enclose a translation of part of an article which appears in the current number of Comptes Rendus of the French Academy of Science. It is by M. Victor Henri, a French chemist, of the best reputation. M. Urbain, whom he quotes, is one of the most distinguished and reliable scientific men. M. Henri's article says:

M. Urbain, who has had an opportunity of examining a number of German shells which failed to explode, informs me that explosive shells of 77 calibre, and shrapnel shells contain mostly a large quantity of violet brown powder, smelling strongly of white phosphorus, 97 per cent. of which consists of various kinds of phosphorus, the red variety predominating in the explosive shells.

The balls are roughened so as to retain a certain quantity of the adhering phosphorus, consequently fragments of the German shells and shrapnel carry into the wound more or less phosphorus.

This should be especially called to the notice of surgeons, for phosphorus produces mortification of the tissues. In contact even with shrapnel balls, microbes, especially anaerobic ones, which produce tetanus and gangrene, find a medium favorable for their development and the wound may become grave.

THE QUEEN'S VOICE.

Teacher Gave His Frank Opinion as to Its Quality.

In her youth, Queen Elizabeth of Roumania spent much time on the training of her voice, and, encouraged by flatterers, came to believe herself to be a singer of unusual talent. At length she decided to have her voice tried by some great teacher. So she went one day, dressed very simply, and without the usual retinue of servants, to see Professor Dumanois of Bucharest, and urged him to give his frank opinion on the quality of her voice, and her future prospects. He tested her voice with great care, first with the simple scales, then with a song, and lastly with an operatic aria.

When the trial was over, the professor said, "I cannot say that you have a wonderful voice. You sing fairly well, and with not a little feeling. I might undertake to train you to sing in operetta; but to speak quite frankly, you haven't the looks for it."

Up to this time the teacher had not known that the rank of the aspirant was any higher than that of scores of other young ladies, equally ambitious, who constantly came to him. But his surprise was great when the lady handed him the visiting card of the queen, and he found that he had before him no less a personage than royalty itself. The queen thanked him heartily for the frank way in which he had judged her musical ability, and went home with her ambition in that direction decidedly diminished.

HOLES IN TREES.

Value of the Woodpecker in Killing Insects.

When you walk along a country road at the edge of a piece of woods, and come to a wild apple tree or a decaying stump from which top and branches have fallen, you will often see a round hole in it halfway up its length, or under a big limb. Any youngster will tell you at once that it is a woodpecker's nest. It is woodpecker work, no doubt, but is it now, or was it ever, the home of a pair of woodpeckers?

Its size will give you a fair hint of whether it was made by the big logcock, by a flicker or a redhead, or by one of the smaller kinds, like the downy or the hairy woodpecker. He is a little checkered fellow, with a broad white stripe down his back and a red cap, and he is a constant visitor to our orchards. He has been called an "inspector of apple trees," for he cleans the fruit trees of borers and other injurious insect pests.

But a woodpecker's hole is not necessarily a nest. The woodpecker digs holes for other purposes. Sometimes he has to cut so deeply to get at a big grub that the hole looks like a house entry. The downy also carves out shallow holes near his real nest as shelters in which to spend stormy days and cold nights, for he is with us in winter as well as in summer. Then, too, woodpeckers make a new nesting hole each season, so you may have found a nest that was deserted long ago.

Other creatures often occupy these abandoned homes. Sometimes it is a mouse or a flying squirrel, but more often some little bird. Whatever it may be, it finds only an empty tenement, since woodpeckers are content to lay their eggs on the fine, clean chips that are left at the bottom of their burrows.

By the way in which the hole is furnished, you may guess who the new occupant is. A mouse fills the cavity with grass; a flying squirrel, with its cast-off fur and other soft stuff. If the hole is crammed with twigs and bits of spider's web, a wren has lived there; if with fine straw, a few feathers, and no forth, probably a bluebird was the tenant; if it contains neatly cut feathers, wool, and cottony stuff, the occupants are no doubt chickadees or nuthatches.

INGENIOUS TREATMENT.

Curing Digestive Troubles by the Use of the Magnet.

Among the latest of the mechanical appliances to be harnessed to the work of human healing is the electro-magnet, which the physician is likely to find of great value in the treatment of certain bowel affections that have hitherto been found very intractable. Dr. Payr, according to a St. Petersburg medical journal, is the originator of the idea.

The patient is required to take first a quantity of water in which much iron is suspended in fine particles. The latter is thus carried to every part of the digestive tract and can be acted upon by the magnet at the will of the operating physician. In a case of stricture of the intestines, for instance, the iron gradually settles at or near the point of obstruction. The same is true where there are adhesions, which have always given serious perplexity to the surgeon.

The moment the magnet is applied, the iron is, of course, attracted with considerable force, and pushing against the interior wall of the intestine, has a tendency to dilate it. The operator is able to direct the "push" in the proper direction. The effect being to dilate the stricture or release the adhesion.

Dr. Payr points out that, by means of this simple mechanism, the intestines may be exercised at will, thus greatly strengthening them and conducing to health and long life in the patient. He has found in his practice that the whole digestive system is to be very materially benefited by a judicious application of this treatment and feels quite positive that in the electromagnet he has hit upon a most efficient aid in the treatment of the whole long list of gastro-intestinal maladies.

AERIAL TRAIL BREAKING

One of the Most Impressive Sights in Nature.

It is impossible for one who has seen only the common mute swans floating about in the artificial lakes of city parks to imagine the grandeur of a flock of the great whistlers in their wild state. In "Wild Life and the Camera," Mr. A. R. Dugmore says the sight is one of the most impressive in nature. As the huge birds rise into the air it seems as if an aerial regatta were being sailed overhead, the swans, each with a wing spread of six or seven feet, moving like yachts under full sail.

Once the swans are fairly under way their speed is amazing, nearly a hundred miles an hour, and that, too, with no apparent effort, for the slow wing motion is very deceiving. The endurance is as surprising as their speed, for they are said to travel a thousand miles without alighting.

The flocks are usually led by an old and experienced swan, and it is said that as one becomes tired of leading, or it might be called aerial trail breaking, his place is taken by another whose strength is equal to the task, and so they continue until they reach their destination, the southern feeding grounds of the winter, or the northern breeding places of the summer. Occasionally they stop to rest in the region of the Great Lakes. Not many years ago, while on their way north, a large number stopped above Niagara Falls, and more than a hundred were, by some extraordinary mischance, carried over the falls and killed in the surging waters.

Whether the swans prepare in any special way for their southward journey is not known; but before starting north they indulge in the curious habit known as "bolleting," that is to say, they eat great quantities of sand for what purpose no one knows.

In the far away Arctic Ocean is their breeding place, and it is believed that they mate for life. As with so many of the water birds, the swans protect their eggs with a covering of down scratched from their own breasts, so that when the birds leave the nest, the two to six large, yellowish eggs are hidden from the eyes of possible thieves, and protected against sudden changes of temperature.

It is many years before the swans are clothed in the feathers of immaculate whiteness that make them such conspicuous objects of beauty. Not, indeed, until the fifth year does all traces of gray disappear. The first feathers are entirely gray; gradually they lighten, becoming mottled with white, the neck and head remaining gray until after the body is completely white.

THE LAND OF HONEST MEN.

No Locks on Doors or Hotel Bedrooms.

A land of almost Utopian simplicity is described by a writer in the Field, who, years ago, started on foot from Innsbruck and went by way of Landeck to the Stelvio Pass, and back across the Tirol to Welschnofen. One of the joys of a walking trip in Tirol, he says, lies in the friendship of these exceedingly simple, honorable, and religious peasants.

They leave their agricultural implements lying all night in the field, covered with a heavy cloth, for the dew is as dishonest among these holy mountains as elsewhere. They have no locks on their barns. They lift a cross with a cry for prayers and the remembrance of God at every quarter of a mile. These crosses mark the spot where some poor soul has died during the wild storms of winter. How dreadful those tempests are can be judged from the fact that we found six such homely wooden monuments, not one more than ten years old, within half a mile.

At Longarone—which is over the Italian border—we discovered that our chamber, the best in the inn, had its lock screwed on topsy-turvy, so that it could not be fastened. Out in the hallway I bellowed for Maria. She came, all surprise. "But the honorable Herr cannot have another bedroom with a better lock, for that's the only lock in the hotel; the only one in the village. The landlord bought it because the foreigners insisted, but he had never seen a lock before. If the honorable Herr will wait until to-morrow, perhaps—ah, but everyone in town knows the honorable travellers are here; everyone knows that they go a long trip and must need much money, so no one could be wicked enough to attempt to deprive the honorable Herr and his honorable Frau of a thing they need so much."

Soldier's Gold Mine.

Three 20-franc gold pieces have been extracted from the skin of Private Bulsey in a Paris hospital. A piece of shrapnel pierced the pocket of another soldier, who had coins, and who was marching ahead of Boissey. The shrapnel and the coins lodged in the leg of Boissey, who didn't have a cent on him before he was wounded.

Where did Noah strike the first nail of the Ark?—On the head.

A British soldier in Belgium was one morning wending his way to camp with a fine rooster in his arms, when he was stopped by his Colonel to know if he had been stealing chickens. "No, Colonel," was the reply. "I saw the old fellow sitting on the wall, and I ordered him to crow for England, and he wouldn't—so I just took him prisoner."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL STUDY

INTERNATIONAL LESSON. FEBRUARY 14.

Lesson VII. Samuel Called to Be a Prophet. 1 Sam. 1. 24-28; 3.

Golden Text, 1 Sam. 3, 9.

Verse 1. The child Samuel ministered unto Jehovah before Eli.—Samuel, in all probability, was a Nazirite (see 1 Sam. 1. 11). He ministered unto the priest in the sense of aiding him in the divine services (see Num. 3, 6; 8, 22). His work was distinctly religious. Afterwards we read that he was the seer whom Saul and his servant consulted in a private difficulty (see 1 Sam. 9. 16ff). He was also a priest (see 1 Sam. 9, 13), a judge (see 1 Sam. 12), and a prophet (see 1 Sam. 19). Between Moses and the founding of the kingdom there was none like him. The Jewish historian Josephus says that Samuel was twelve years old at the time of our lesson.

The word of Jehovah was precious in those days.—"Precious" means "rare."

No frequent vision.—That is, no widely spread or promulgated declaration of God.

2. His eyes had begun to wax dim.—Practically the same statement is made of Isaac in Gen. 27. 1.

3. The temple of Jehovah where the ark of God was.—Temple means tabernacle (see 1 Sam. 1. 9; Psa. 5. 7).

4. Here am I.—This is a usual greeting when a summons is obeyed. It is used in responding to a call of the Deity as well as to a call of man. It means, "Here I am to submit myself to your command" (see Gen. 22. 1, 7, 11; 27. 1, 18). There are many other such references in the Old Testament.

5-9. The persistence with which Samuel was called and also with which he ran to Eli, thinking it was Eli who called him, showed to the aged prophet that Jehovah had a message for the boy. One who had spent his life in serving God as Eli had would not mistake long the nature of the call which came to Samuel.

10. Came and stood.—A personal presence is indicated, and not a mere voice. See the incident of Abraham and Jehovah (Gen. 18. 17, 20, 21, 33) and Gideon (Judg. 6. 14).

11. Both the ears of every one that heareth it shall tingle.—This expression occurs only three times in the Old Testament—here and in 2 Kings 21. 12 and Jer. 19 3. Jeremiah (7. 14, 11, 25, 6, 9) compares the destruction of Jerusalem to Shiloh. So also does the writer of Psa. 78. 60 61.

12. All that I have spoken.—This has reference to 1 Sam. 2. 27-36.

From the beginning even unto the end. That is, the destruction will be thorough and complete.

13. He restrained them not.—Eli did remonstrate with his sons for their iniquity (see 1 Sam. 2. 22-25). He, however, did not remove them from office, and, as they did not repent, Eli, in effect, became responsible for their wickedness.

19. Samuel grew.—(See 1 Sam. 2. 21, 26). This shows that he was young. It is interesting to make comparisons with this statement as to how Samuel grew before Jehovah, the statement made for Luke (2. 52) as to how Jesus grew.

Let none of his words fall.—One reason why Samuel grew when Jehovah was with him was because he shaped his life so closely to the will of Jehovah.

20. From Dan even to Beer-sheba.—This phrase appears first in Judg. 20. 1; again in 2 Sam. 17. 11; 24. 2, 15; 1 Kings 4. 25. Dan was in the extreme north and Beer-sheba was in the extreme south of the borders of Israel, and the statement is equivalent to our statement "from Halifax to Vancouver," or "from the Lakes to the Pacific." Not only distance, however, was indicated by the phrase; it had reference, also, to the people. From Dan to Beer-sheba meant "all Israel." During the separation of the kingdom the phrase was "from Geba to Beer-sheba (see 2 Kings 23. 8).

Cook's Folly Legend.

One of the most popular legends in the country is that told in connection with Cook's Folly, the residence, near Bristol, England, of the late Sir Herbert Ashman. The old tower which stands in the midst of the building was long years ago built by a Mr. Cook for the preservation of his son, whose death by violence before he reached his twenty-first birthday had been foretold by a gipsy. The boy spent many years in safety, shut up in the tower; but on the morning of his twenty-first birthday, when the anxious father entered to release him, he was found dead from the bite of an adder, which had been concealed in some faggots passed through a window on the previous evening for the lad's fire.

Sammy was not prone to over-exertion in the classroom; therefore his mother was both surprised and delighted when he came home one noon with the announcement: "I got 100 this morning." "That's lovely, Sammy!" exclaimed his proud mother, and she kissed him tenderly. "What was it in?" "Fifty in reading and fifty in 'rithmetic."

Or, The Hope That Still Lived.

"Hemphil Cipher," commented Timothy Nobbs disapprovingly. And these he left it on the table and, quitting the sitting-room, proceeded to go very softly upstairs.

On the first landing there were three rooms all empty. He went up to the Landing above.

Here a half-door confronted him. He passed through it, and found a second door, of the ordinary kind this time. From the other side of this door came a great noise of talking. Talking? Why, surely, there must be thirty or forty persons all at it at once! In the course of a long life spent in service in the best families, Timothy Nobbs had grown fairly accustomed to surprises. He did not withdraw at the present critical moment, but, turned on by curiosity as well as by the conviction that something unholy was going forward, he straightway opened the door and presented himself within the room that was on the other side of it. No doubt, he presented an unwelcome spectacle to the company upon whom he intruded; but the spectacle which he presented to them was not worth mentioning in comparison with the spectacle which they on their side offered to him.

A large number of men there were thirty-five or forty of them at the very least—some standing, some sitting, and some walking about, but nearly all talking in loud tones of argument. Most of them were well dressed, but not one of them had the aspect of a gentleman; or, at least none of them possessed this aspect in the eyes of a trained observer like Timothy Nobbs had grown fairly accustomed to surprises. He did not withdraw at the present critical moment, but, urged on by curiosity as well as by the conviction that something unholy was going forward, he straightway opened the door and presented himself within the room that was on the other side of it. No doubt, he presented an unwelcome spectacle to the company upon whom he intruded; but the spectacle which he presented to them was not worth mentioning in comparison with the spectacle which they on their side offered to him.

A large number of men there were thirty-five or forty of them at the very least—some standing, some sitting, and some walking about, but nearly all talking in loud tones of argument. Most of them were well dressed, but not one of them had the aspect of a gentleman; or, at least none of them possessed this aspect in the eyes of a trained observer like Timothy Nobbs. Imitation Nobbs observed, too, that most of them looked what he would have called tawdry. Their language, too, was the language of the racecourse, being full of strange words, in which numbers and odds were spoken of in a manner mystifying to the ordinary outsider. The butler understood something of the jargon he had heard something like it many times before in many of his different situations on occasions when he had driven his masters and sodas to congregations of gentlemen still lingering in smoking rooms and billiard-rooms in the small hours of the morning.

Now, too, the inquisitive eyes saw at the farthest corner of the room two card-tables, with little heaps of coin scattered about them, and groups of men gathered around them so deeply absorbed with their cards that they appeared to be still unaware that the door had opened. By an exclamation from one of the betting men they had been called to forget, for the time, the same outer door. Timothy Nobbs recovered from it was only by accident and by the kindness of Providence that he had been able to resist his shocked elderly eyes upon the unpleasant scene before him. At the same time he saw the tall, thin figure of the cunning Louise detach itself from a little crowd gathered by the fireplace.

It is all right, he heard her say to the men around her. "You need not be alarm-ed. Our visitor is not a detective in disguise, but only my future husband, Mr. Timothy Nobbs. We are all quite safe with him."

One of the party immediately about her laughed. "That's all right, then," he said, "as sure my clever Louise, you're to be congratulated on your choice of a husband. This fellow looks formable enough to keep the police not only away from the door, but away even from the street."

The elderly man received the congratulation with a smile that was intended to be fascinating. But in Timothy Nobbs's case had mistaken her man, and she was soon to be made aware of that fact.

"So you're sure of me, are you?" she said, in a manner that was considered quite humble under the circumstances, but with wrath. "And this is how you get your money, is it? By keeping a den of illegal betting and gambling also? And this is the sort of place you wanted me to be figure-head for? Well, you've made a mistake in that. I can tell you. You and your precious associates that you were so obsequious here 'ad better look out that I don't get you a taste of prison all round. And this is the sort of thing that goes on behind the scenes in London, is it? And the name of it—why, Master Ronald—Master Ronald!"

Now for the second time the fair, harsh face of Christine's mother the mother who had resembled her now no more before him. Heedless of the tumult which her words had created, and of the thunder-cloud of face she had provoked to descend, he made his way to where the young man stood and laid a shaky hand on his sleeve.

"Master Ronald, come away from here! Won't you come home with your mother at once to your sister? Dear Miss Christine has been grieving and grieving for you all night long, and dreadful all the while she won't you come out from this abominable place, Master Ronald, and let me take you to her? She's quite ill, my lady says. From working like an angel among the sick and starving in the East End, Miss Christine's dead, you're the only one, Master Ronald. Won't you let me take you to her?"

Ronald Dare lifted his haggard young face, where now the shame was mingled with every more deeply than before. "And the bullet and the men round saw that his eyes were wet.

"I'm not fit to go to her, Nobbs," he said hoarsely. "I'm not fit to look upon her face. And if you're the only one doing what work I'm doing here, she'd rather die than see me, or call me brother again."

CHAPTER IX.

Tell mother what we'll get something good for Alice to-day. I'm going to bring my months money home to-night."

Maggie Maitland said to a kindly neighbor who for some personal object was about to make a journey to Brixton, and who had called at Mr. Jeffery's shop on her way back to know if the little, pinched girl had any message that she would like to send to Whitelady's Gardens, where the lower little sick sister whom she herself would not be able to see until twelve o'clock that night lay confined.

"Tell them I'll come home as soon as ever I can, so as to be able to buy some meat before the shops shut," the girl added cheerily. "You see Alice has got to have some beef tea, for she's ailing, and I've felt the need for explaining the extravagance," said the doctor said a week ago that she ought to have it, but we couldn't afford it until I got my money. You can say I think it'll be nearly a pound, because I've been working very hard, and earning some overtime—that means commissions, you know. If you can return-number to tell mother that, it'll cheer her up a little. She was so miserable at the beginning of the week, long I came away from home. She caught a bright little smile, which irradiated her tired young face with the radiance of a new hope—a very humble hope, but oh! so real and comforting. And when the kindly neighbor had gone she had been able to get the privilege of three ten minutes' talk by buying some reels of cotton and some tape—the shabby little shop assistant, whose black frock had been stigmatised by her employer as unfit to be seen behind his counter, set to work with a will, forcing herself to be brisk in order to get her work done early, so that Mr. Jeffery might be pleased with her, and might therefore possibly grant her permission to leave the shop a little earlier that evening.

Outside the snow was falling heavily, so that customers were comparatively few in number, and were mostly very poor people, who bought only penny-worths. As always since she had come to work here, Maggie was deadly tired; so deadly tired that the temptation while waiting for customers to slide out one of the seats from beneath the counter and rest thereupon for a moment was very hard to resist. But she knew well that even though the shop were empty such a rest would mean dismissal. Even though for five minutes she was nothing that really needed doing, the assistants behind the counter must still remain standing and make pretence at sorting; that is to say, they must turn over and arrange and rearrange handkerchiefs or odd bits of ribbon or stockings in the counter baskets, so that any customer coming in might get an impression of much haste and activity. So Maggie stood with the others, and did the things they did looking forward wearily to the hour which would set her free. Little nine-year-old Alice was dangerously ill now. For a fortnight past the weather had been bitter, and there had not been money enough for a fire to be afforded in the small attic room in the respectable house they stood in a row of in follows in Princess Street, off Edgware Road; so the already stricken child, who would never be able to walk any more, had somehow got pneumonia, and might be dying.

But to-night, the fifth of the month, money was due, and to-night for the first time the little girl would have some nourishing food.

She was glad that the neighbor had chanced to come in at the very moment denting her able to send the good news about the money to help the poor, anxious old mother, still dazed by the sadness and the cruelty of London, to get through the misery of the day. For she had only expected the parcel to arrive, and would regard the bestowing of it as nothing less than a heaven-sent deliverance. It was a terrible thing to have insufficient food and clothing in weather like this, and a still more terrible thing to have practically no fire in a room where a child, who was unspeakably dear and precious, lay desperately ill with a form of illness which only too often ends fatally among the poor, that is to say, among those who cannot afford such nourishing food as is needed to keep up the patient's strength.

Not that Mrs. Maitland need have had her grate empty if her pride had not stood in her way. On the contrary, the doctor had come a weeks or so ago, in the course of exhaustion, had driven her home, and thereby saved her from actual illness—still came to the house, although with no thought of reward, for everything in his power to help and cheer them. Their pitiful condition and true to first been perfectly plain to him. Maggie knew that, although he had never said it would be, acknowledge it, he was a friend to the girl knew Mrs. Maitland could for an instant imagine it possible that poverty which had reached the degree which theirs had reached could be a single hour to be hidden even from the eyes of a fool. But the old mother's pride blinded her. As the months when the doctor was expected, she would make a little fire of odds and ends of any sort, and she believed that by this little innocent deception she had prevented him from suspecting the miserable truth namely, that there was no fuel at all. Alice, who was suffering from inflammation of the lungs, lay constantly now in a bitterly cold room, whether in the unwarmed room, whose warmth in the most mild ordinary temperature very low degrees, the difference between the temperature of the street outside.

Maggie was not sure whether or not she sympathised with this kind of pride. All that she was sure of was the danger which it involved for Alice and baby, if her salary day had not been so near she might have tried to persuade Mrs. Maitland that for once one in point so vital; but the money would soon be here, and then everything would be right. Not that the money would be much when it did come. But poor Maggie's ideas of what eighteen shillings, or even could do were as yet painfully incorrect. When one has been for days without a shilling one has great ideas of how much a shilling can buy.

So, as Maggie thought and thought all the long Saturday morning, while the clock of dirty, half-melted snow made the world a very grey, miserable look outside, she grew melancholy at these words. The little sum of money that was to represent the first months of life seemed to her eyes to the proportions of something very like a small fortune; the little sum which he employer was rather mean in giving her for the two days' advance in payment, which entailed on her no hardship at all, would not, of course, be much more than or three pence, no doubt. That and the one five which he had sent round to relate her with at least sixteen shillings clear. And sixteen shillings now seemed to her almost wealth.

The evening came, and with it a shout upon the square-jawed footy countenance of Mr. Jeffery, as he realised that this particular day was Saturday, and that he could add to the many other pennies he counted among those pitiless days when his cash drawer, as Maggie watched over by Mrs. Jeffery, contained little more than silver. Maggie saw him open it at the moment of starting home, one of the many. His temper was not improved by the dissatisfaction, and the girls behind the counter went on more eagerly and assiduously with the unnecessary business of trying to appear overworked. They beat the dust from and shook out garments, they folded gloves, cheap ribbons, cheap handkerchiefs, and cheap other things laid out for the morning's display, they put away the brushes of customers, and worried an Edgware Road woman over so though she had come in only to buy a penny pencil on the most exorbitant of the arrangements of the assistants. Maggie Maitland knowing them to express her thoughts, she would have said that three shillings, paltry, tawdry three shillings, at every pence from a penny three farthings up to sixpence three farthings, inspired her with a strange, fierce hunger not to throw away at times almost brought tears into her eyes.

It three bits of handkerchiefs and bags and ribbon bows could of any use to anybody I could understand better but they to made for, and what people buy them for, she was wonderingly one day to Miss Jones, who was the only one of the very good was bearing the ship either harsh or short. Three shillings on a pincushion made up out of three or four scraps of the cheapest cotton-backed satin and—Now, look at that woman coming in direction of the doorway through which the customer had a moment ago disappeared. She looks as if she—

As poor and nearly as miserable as if she hadn't anything to eat in the purse and basket and yet she comes in better and wastes four pence, as you may say, on that wee bit of a bow. Indeed, it will be of any more use to her than if it was a stone."

"It's the three farthings that does it," Miss Jones replied, contriving adroitly at the same time to work on industriously over her fat basket of ribbons. "It's neither the proprietor nor the proprietress should observe that she was helping to beguile the leaden minutes with a little amiable chatter. A good many people say the three-farthings are a guilty and so it is; for if a thing is so valuable that you can't let it go for one shilling and fourpence-ha'penny, why shouldn't you mark it up at two shillings straight off? Of course, everybody knows that on a thing of the price the shopkeeper expects a fourpence or sixpence profit at the very least; why, there's a lot of 'em that expects half of the money paid for their profit. And all the time they try to shove it down the customers' throats that it wasn't for the odd farthing they wouldn't get any profit on the article at all. As if it wasn't as plain as a pikestaff to everybody that they make the price one and sixpence-three farthings so that it shouldn't look two shillings.

Oh!" said Maggie, looking up innocently, and quite forgetting the sly and imposing necessity still to appear deeply absorbed in her sorting. She had gone through the same basket three times already, but that did not alter the case in the least degree.

Miss Jones would have nodded in rejoinder, but for the fear that she might be caught in the act by the equally keen eyes of her employer and his wife.

"Why, of course," she answered, convincingly. "Every one knows how bad they've been a good few. I can tell you—as each ever and ever again in the shops that eight customers run of, and on especially women, will buy a quark as you please as long as that quark is marked three and sixpence three farthings, when they wouldn't look at it if the price was four shillings. You see, the three comes first, and the people don't pay much attention to the odd coppers; they think the thing is a shilling cheaper, instead of only a farthing. Of course, they're found out in time through the Jones's, and men wouldn't stand it in their shops, not for a single minute. It ought to be put a stop to in the drapery trade, I think, and it soon would if a few hundred ladies would only go about shopping the one I mean, of course, who have the most means, and who tend to come round to all sorts of abuse for Westend houses, and small places like that, and in the country, and ask the prices of things. And when anybody told her the price of a thing was three and sevenpence three farthings, she used to say slowly, 'I see, four shillings. Well, I don't quite mark up plain and straight, and not try to humbug people into buying a thing because they think it's cheap, I'll take it at four shillings.' Of course, if you or me was to do that, we should get shouted inside out, and the shop-walker turned on to us, and perhaps a good customer at the same time.

Whose chattering there?" Mr. Jeffery thundered out from the end of the shop. "Keep silence there! Do you hear? You had better look out. I don't pay and feed and lodge a pack of young women in order that they may waste their time in gossiping like jays and neglecting their employers' business, this instant!"

That stopped Maggie again, the time in a sad and sad distress. Oh, it was so very, very sad!

She remembered in time that she was not to be discovered in the act of listening to observe, and her heart right and sank almost as the thought of the shillings. No doubt it would be only two pence, but even the small sum was a matter of the most serious importance to her mind.

A short, dull, bitter afternoon of minutes it was already growing dark, and with the deepening of the evening there arose that chaos and of London, the noise and confusion of which, though in the splendid streets and squares of the fresh trouble quarters, the close and through the meaner and sadder suburbs, an thoroughfares which formed the direct route from the City to the West End, operations as a loom proper. The chaos of packing up had a bad day by doing little brisk business in all events it had been small enough, while still there had been nothing worth to be would be coming in so far than the speedily-falling snow. Now that the east wind had come, and great porous-like flakes of cotton-wool began to descend momentarily that no one goods had nothing to do with his customers stomachs he might as well close his shop down at ten o'clock as waste gas or keeping them open until two on a Saturday night. And all the neighborhood, and south this particular class of shop, to close at two o'clock. Mr. Jeffery knew as evidently one that although people may go out late at night in bitter weather to buy bread or even meat, they will not buy cabbage, even the most hardy among these worthy folks will hardly stir up on the same night to spend their pence on their eyesores it would be folly to mention clear shillings by spending a bit of calico or a yard of ribbon, or any article of the sort that a draper supplies. So, at a quarter past ten this satisfied shopkeeper put on his shutters and prepared to retire first to the cottage-room fireside, and secondly to bed. He had commanded his assistants to hurry up with their packing away of the lights, and all stock, telling them that the waste in gas and candles which their slowness and laziness usually cost him was calculated to bring him and Mrs. Jeffery one day into close proximity to the workhouse. Driven thus by the lash of his sarcasm, the young employees worked as quickly as the fatigue would permit. Maggie Maitland, being urged also by her own heart-eagerness, worked even faster than they did; so that for once, this evening, the dingy walls of each of the two little narrow shops, that together formed Mr. Jeffery's drapery home looked down on the rare spectacle of a closed shop with everything in its properly parked away at no later than a quarter to eleven on a Saturday night.

Always Forgetting.

They had just been married, and were about to start on their wedding trip. As is the custom with bridegrooms, he was embarrassed to the point of forgetfulness, but he met the situation like an expert.

"Why, Harry, you bought only one ticket," said the bride reproachfully. "Just like me, dear," said Harry, quickly, "always forgetting myself."

Take every chance you can possibly get to be kind; because some day there may be no more chances.

He who gives too much attention to the business of other people is surely neglecting his own.

Husband and Father of this Family in Danger.

This picture shows the wife and children of Private Lonsdale, a British prisoner of war at Doberitz in Germany, who was sentenced to death for striking a German officer in the concentration camp. It was only through the intervention of James W. Gerard, the American ambassador at Berlin, that his life was saved, and it is now stated that the drastic sentence will probably not be carried out. Instead the soldier may have to undergo the original sentence of ten years' imprisonment. The entire matter may be taken up by a higher military court of the German army.

A WAR QUESTION.

Is Great Britain Justified in Fighting for Belgian Neutrality?

Posterity is sure to hold the nation that was responsible for this, the greatest and most devastating war known to history, in great abhorrence, and it is for this reason, mainly, that the German savants have issued their special plea on behalf of the Kaiser, and that her Press has come to their air in a stupendous endeavour to place responsibility anywhere, so long as Germany and her war lord are exempted.

Neutrality as applied to nations, means the refusal of a third power to go to war in behalf of either of two belligerent nations, and though always looked upon by hard fighting nations unfavorably, the right is as old as history.

The Napoleonic wars broke up very many of the small states of Europe; and when that era ended the five great powers assembled fully emerged from it formed a combine for the future government of Europe, and worked out a new scheme for the surviving small states which were especially important as strategical ground from their geographical location.

They called it a "perpetual neutralization." The signing powers consisting of Russia, Prussia, Austria, France and England, entered into a treaty that certain designated small countries should be reserved from conquest by every other power, and they united in what they called a "guaranty of neutrality."

There were nine such areas, not all in Europe, covered by this treaty, among them Belgium, in 1831, Luxembourg, Switzerland, etc., coming in at different dates later on.

The great significance of these treaties is that they indicate a definite purpose on the part of the great powers to remove certain possible points of friction from the arena of war.

The Belgian treaty was superceded by a later one, bearing date in 1839, and all were in full force and effect when the present great war began. The chief purpose of these agreements was to remove the possibility of any one nation gaining an advantage over its neighbor by destroying or annexing a region in which other powers were intensely interested, and not so much to protect the weak nation from molestation.

This system of neutralization was greatly strengthened by the second Hague Conference in 1907, which adopted a chapter on "The Rights and Duties of Neutral Powers," and the first signature to this was by a distinguished official representative of the German Government. Each of the signatory nations (and this includes Great Britain), gained the right to demand and expect that none of the other powers would violate the neutrality of any of the states enumerated in the treaty in case of war. Each agreed to keep "hands off" entirely, so that the others might have no excuse for laying hands on! But, independent of all treaties or Hague Conventions, the right of any state to remain neutral has ever been recognized throughout history. A state has a right to be treated as neutral simply because it is in fact neutral. Switzerland has succeeded in maintaining her neutrality because of the peculiar conformation of her surface, and while Belgium's neutralization has been threatened several times since 1830, because the country is flat and easily invaded on every side.

To protect Belgium from the Dutch, and still more, to protect France, England and Prussia (Germany) from each other, the aforesaid five great powers in 1831 signed a treaty that "Belgium shall form an independent and perpetually neutral state, "and shall be bound to observe neutrality towards all other states." The first serious danger to Belgium neutrality came through the annexation of Hanover and other German states by Prussia in 1866, but the storm blew over, and Belgian neutrality was only strengthened and confirmed by the strong stand taken by the Gladstone Government at the time, and to which the other great powers, including Germany, gracefully acceded.

Things remained in statu quo, as the lawyers phrase it, until on the 4th of August, 1914, Germany, without any other excuse than "military necessity," as her Chancellor expressed it, invaded Belgian soil, well knowing that France, depending upon the aforesaid treaty, had omitted to fortify her possessions along the Belgian frontier, and that invasion of France by the Kaiser's forces from that direction, would meet with but little resistance. Treaties, so were told by the same great German Lord Chancellor, are of no more importance than scraps of waste paper, and thus he metaphorically tore up the neutrality papers and contemptuously scattered them to the four winds of heaven.

The foregoing official announcements and historic dates should settle the question of responsibility for the war, but this has been met by German critics and apologists in unofficial assertions, printed and scattered broadcast throughout the United States, claiming that Belgium, between July 21 and August 4, the date of German occupancy of Belgium, was guilty of hostile acts justifying German invasion.

CHAS. M. BICE.

Denver, Jan. 18, 1915.

THE SOLDIER AND HIS WILL.

How the State Arranges Important Matters for Him.

The soldier, according to Kipling, is an absent-minded beggar. The British law itself seems to have the prevalent idea about Tommy Atkins being absent-minded, for it gives him a special privilege which is denied to the civilian. This is in regard to the making of a will.

If the ordinary civilian in the Old Country wishes to make his will he has to comply with all sorts of formalities and technicalities. He is practically bound to go to a trained lawyer—otherwise there will be trouble and expense when he dies.

For Tommy Atkins none of these terrors exist. He has the privilege of ignoring them altogether, and disposing of his belongings in a very simple way. He does not need any witnesses, nor technical phrases, nor elaborate clauses. He can even dispense with writing if he so desires, and just say, by word of mouth, what his will is with regard to his property.

The law says that a soldier who is in actual military service may dispose of his personal estate without the usual formalities.

It can be either in writing or by word of mouth. He need not wait until he is twenty-one either, as a civilian has to do. The important point which is always cropping up, however, is, when is a soldier in actual military service?

There were some interesting cases on the point, after the Boer War. When the War Office wanted volunteers for South Africa a certain young man offered himself. He passed all the medical tests and went into barracks, which happened to be in the same town. He then made his will in barracks.

Later on he went out to South Africa, where he was killed in action. His will was disputed, and an attempt made to upset it on the ground that he was not in actual military service when it was made. It was decided, however, that as soon as he had taken certain steps under orders preliminary to going to the front he was in actual military service, and the will was declared to be a good and valid soldier's will.

The privilege extends not only to soldiers, but to sailors as well. In the case of a sailor he must be at sea when the will is made. As usual in these cases, it is left to the courts to say who is a sailor within the meaning of the Act. For instance, a purser on board a warship had made a will without the usual formalities. Subsequently the will was questioned and the question was, "Was a purser a seaman?" The court decided that he was.

More than one will has been made on the battlefield, and more than one soldier has died from wounds within a few minutes of scribbling out a dying message which has been construed into a will.

During the Boer war, one of our soldiers, before going to the trenches, told one of his officers that if he were killed he wanted all his property to go to a certain person. The officer happened to make a note of it.

Later on the soldier's name found its way on the roll of honor, and a dispute arose over his belongings. The officer produced his notes of the dead man's wishes, and it was held that they were a good and valid will.

Lastly, it may be remarked that this privilege of the soldier is no new thing, for it was introduced by Julius Cæsar for the benefit of his Roman army. It was introduced in England in 1837.

"You claim that you love me, said Gladys. "And so I do," replied Clarence fervently. "Do you love me enough to die for me?" she continued. "Well hardly that," said Clarence, "because mine is the truest undying love."

The Paisley Advocate

PAISLEY, FEB. 11th, 1915

—According to the Walkerton papers the anathemas of the county town's populace have fallen thickly upon the head of County Registrar W. H. McFarlane since he saw fit to dispense with the Deputy Registrar, Mr. Geo. D. McKay. The latter has proven himself the acme of competence in his occupancy of that position, and his removal will be deplored and regretted with good reason. It is most improbable, however, that any outburst of indignation or upheaval of opinion in the county town will be the means of retaining for Mr. McKay his place in the office. Registrar McFarlane is vested with sufficient authority in the matter to discharge his subordinates and employ others in their stead if he finds it to his advantage to do so, without consulting either the public or the political party which granted him the senior position on political grounds only. Should he, however, employ a person as deputy who cannot satisfactorily attend to the duties that fall to his lot, and the services of the office become unreliable or untrustworthy, and a source of loss to those who are obliged to become patrons, then it will be time to talk of ousting the senior officer. We venture to say that not all the newspaper bombast that can be brought to bear upon the case at present will influence the powers that be. The case is, in our eyes, only another that goes to show the folly of the political patronage system under which our provincial and national affairs are conducted. Had the promotion system been in vogue when the registrarship became vacant, Mr. McKay would have stepped up to the higher place in our county town, and possibly ere this time would have been called to a provincial position. For men of his unquestioned capabilities there are many opportunities presented, as for the really responsible positions there are fewer qualified, and under the promotion system it would be hard to keep a good man down. Local patriotism may prompt Walkerton papers to holler just now, but we have never known either to so far depart from the well-beaten path followed by party politicians as to leave off carrying aloft the flag that is emblazoned with the old, old traditional slogan, "To the victors belong the spoils!" Along with the incongruity of the spoils system, that is, its incompatibility with general business principles, is the waste entailed to the county through paying two salaries when there is only need for one. And this occurs not only in the Bruce registry office, but probably in a great many other offices. Mr. McKay is a man who thoroughly "understands his job," and whose services might be invaluable to any county, or even in a department at Toronto or Ottawa would do more efficient work than three or four of the ornamental appointees in patronage positions. Would it be possible to secure his appointment? No need to ask. Neither political party would adopt such a sound business proposition because of the patronage system. Grit and Tory partizans, alike, must be served with the loaves and fishes that are providentially found in the party baskets. It's high time such political punk were burned out of our constitutional timber. The "mints" should be producing wealth for the nation instead of for individuals or groups of party followers. In giving expression to these sentiments we are not pretending to hold a brief for Registrar McFarlane. He will be found quite capable of upholding his position in the matter. Following is what The Herald-Times has to say:

Mr Geo D McKay, who for the past twenty-three years has been deputy-registrar of deeds here, and who has brought the Bruce Registry Office up to such a state of efficiency that the Provincial Inspector declared it to be about the best conducted registry office in the Province, is now holding down the job no more, his official head having been lopped off on Saturday by the boss of the works, Mr McFarlane, who was appointed master of the mint—for a mint it is—on the death of Register Buck a few years ago. The job is so well paid that the boss can draw anywhere from $2100 to $2500 a year without getting any labor dust on his hands, the hired help doing the work and leaving the above sum as his lordship's share for merely playing figure-head around the place. Mr McKay who drew a salary of $1300 a year, was merely the man behind the guns, and so efficient did he keep the works that for the past fifteen years no abstract that he issued has been questioned by a loan company in Ontario. This is a record to be proud of, especially as Bruce as the largest occupied acreage of any county in the Province and consequently more books to handle. It is most essential that the man issuing abstracts of title understand his job, as the titles and property of the people are at stake, and consequently the public in this case have a right to demand that Registrar McFarlane keep the most competent help possible on the job, and not put on cheaper labor that he may gobble up more of the fees, as it is only too apparent he is now doing. He can pay Mr McKay $1300 besides hiring his other help, and still have from $2100 to $2500 per year for resting himself in an arm-chair, he certainly should be satisfied, and if he isn't—well, we know of men who have done quite as much for the Conservative party as Mr McFarlane ever did, who would be glad any day to take his place. The office can spare McFarlane much better than Mr. Kay, and that is no throwing much of a bouquet at McKay either. The public who contribute the fees that keep the office as well paid, have a right to expect something for their money and we don't believe the people of Bruce will stand for the stunt that Mr McFarlane is pulling off. Many people who trusted to McKay for a proper abstract or title will now feel disposed to go to the expense of hiring a lawyer to make the search, as few will care to put their trust in talent that they don't know, and that the cheaper help that Mr McFarlane has imported to boost his bank account will not contribute very heavily to the wealth of the patrons of the office. In other words the removal of Mr McKay to save a few hundred dollars for the boss will not be welcomed by the people of Bruce, and we understand that a petition will be circulated asking the Government to interfere in this matter. Mr McKay is treasurer of Knox Church, and is a member of the High School Board, the Public Library Board, the Hospital Trust, and is otherwise so identified with the public weal that Walkerton cannot afford to lose him as a citizen, nor Bruce County as an official.

TO INCREASE PRODUCTION

The Agricultural Departments of the Dominion and of the Province of Ontario have entered upon a co-operative plan of campaign to stimulate production on Canadian farms. Conferences are being arranged for at many centres, and one is advertised to be held in the town hall, Paisley, on Thursday of next week, Feb. 18th, at which information of value to all farmers will be given by agricultural experts of the highest standing. The programme of addresses will be found in another column of this issue of THE ADVOCATE. Let the farmers of the surrounding townships turn out in full force to show that they are fully alive to their own interests and the interests of the Empire in this great crisis.

The "Patriotism and Increased Production" campaign was inaugurated at a banquet held in the King Edward Hotel, Toronto, on Wednesday evening of last week, at which were gathered representatives of trade and commerce, big industries, the government and financial sphere, all of whom eulogized the agriculturist and breeder in glowing terms, and the farmer received heartfelt tributes for his patriotism and sense of duty in the present turning point in the world's progress. The immediate necessity for more production of foodstuffs during the coming season was urged with considerable emphasis and the general importance of the co-operation of the farmer with all other classes in the Empire under the conditions which are arising was also made plain. The duty of the grain-grower and the live stock raiser was shown to be unquestionably defined as never before. The status of the producers was as clear, it was pointed out, as the standing of any other class in the national existence.

The question of finances for the former, including the homesteader, received considerable attention and the problems of transportation were also discussed at length. It was imperative that the financiers, the railroads, the manufacturers and the distributors should get down to necessarily smooth-working arrangements in order to reap the maximum benefit for the community. More training schools were needed as well.

The chief speaker was the Hon Martin Burrell, Dominion Minister of Agriculture, and others were Mr J W Flavelle, Mr Peter White, K. C., of Renfrew, Mr E F B Johnston, K.C., Premier Hearst, and Mr N W Rowell, Opposition leader in Ontario.

HORSE DEALERS HAVE GRIEVANCE

London Advertiser

James McCartney, the local horsedealer, said yesterday to The Advertiser that the action of Sir Adam Beck and the Dominion Government, in shutting the Imperial Army from purchasing horses in this country, had meant the diversion of millions of dollars to the United States.

"First, remember this—we are not 'squealing' because Sir Adam Beck and the Canadian Government are buying horses direct from the farmers," said Mr McCartney, "but we do say, and the dealers all over the country will support me, that if Sir Adam had not stepped in there would be thousands of the finest horses being bought to day for the Imperial Government at a higher price to the farmer than is being paid for the types purchased by the Canadian Government.

"I believe that any man who tries to gouge money out of the country at this time is no good, but if there is money going, if the Imperial authorities are buying horses for $150 and $175 in the United States, and the dealers in Canada can supply those horses, paying the farmers a fair figure, it is a shame both from the farmer's and the dealer's standpoint, that this money should not be coming to Canada.

"I have bought more than 800 horses in this district since the war started, all for the Imperial authorities. That means a lot of money. In many cases I paid $185 for a horse that I received $200 for. This was for the type known as gunners for artillery. For the riders cavalry mounts, the Imperial army paid $175. The farmer knew the prices paid and was given a good thing. The Imperial authorities were satisfied with the horses, at least I have heard no complaint, and we could be selling all sorts of animals here now if it were not that Sir Adam has closed up the outlet and is buying only horses for the Canadian troops. There are thousands of horses for sale in the country enough for all, and the horse-raisers should be getting the benefit. The French army will buy horses here if it could.

TORTURED BY CONSTIPATION

"Fruit-a-tives" Cured Paralyzed Bowels and Digestion

ST. BONIFACE DE SHAWINIGAN, QUE. Feb. 3rd, 1914.

"It is a pleasure to me to inform you that after suffering from Chronic Constipation for 3½ years, I have been cured by "Fruit-a-tives". While I was a student at Berthier College, I became an ill I was forced to leave the the college. Severe pains across the intestines continually tortured me and it came to a point when I could not stoop down at all, and my Digestion became paralyzed. Some one advised me to take "Fruit-a-tives" and at once I felt a great improvement. After I had taken four or five boxes, I realized that I was completely cured and what made me glad, also, was that they were acting gently, causing no pain whatever to the bowels. All those who suffer with Chronic Constipation should follow my example and take "Fruit-a-tives" for they are the medicine that cures".

MAGLOIRE PAQUIN

"Fruit-a-tives" are sold by all dealers at 50c. a box, 6 for $2.50, trial size, 25c. or sent postpaid on receipt of price by Fruit-a-tives Limited, Ottawa.

THE FAMILY ELECTRIC LIGHT CO., COLWELL, Sec'y, Paisley P.O. Lot 31, con. 2, Bruce.

J. A. MCNEIL, Manager.

THE LATE MRS. F. CARTER

Although she had been afflicted for a year and a half with a serious ailment, the death of Mrs F Carter came very suddenly and unexpectedly to the family and friends, as she was on the last day of her life looking better and feeling stronger than for some time previously, and the news of her passing away on the morning of Feb 1st was a shock to the whole community.

The deceased was born at Dunblane, the youngest daughter in the family of the late Mr and Mrs John Scofield, and had been a resident of Paisley since girlhood. In 1877 she was married to Mr Carter, who survives her with six of their family, viz: George L, in partnership with his father here; Mrs Miller and Mary in Toronto; Constance, Edna and Hilda at home.

Mrs Carter was a person of vivacious disposition, sociable, kindly and considerate in her relations with friends or acquaintances, true and devoted to husband and family. She was for over thirty years a member of the Methodist church and took an active part in such organizations within that congregation as the ladies' aid and union society. She leaves sweet and tender memories as the legacy of a useful and consistent life.

The funeral took place on Thursday afternoon, having been postponed from Wednesday on account of trains being delayed by the storm. Service was held in the Methodist church, and the building was filled to the doors by the large concourse of people assembled to pay their last respects to one who has so long been generally known, esteemed and respected. Rev Mr Facey led the service, being assisted by Revs McEwen and Diehl. Interment was made in the family plot in the Paisley cemetery. Many beautiful floral tributes adorned the casket, entwining them being one from the Ladies' Aid of the Methodist church. The pall-bearers were Messrs H B Putnam, R B Grant, J S Dewar, J H Steele, J McMillan and I S Cruickshank.

Four sisters and one brother of deceased are living: Mrs Beattie, of Cairo, Ont; Mrs T Patterson, of Sault Ste Marie, Ont; Mrs H Reed, of Paisley; Mrs T Moffat, of Greelock; William Scofield, of Vancouver, B C.

JAMES McKITTRICK

There has passed from among us another of the Bruce's staid and godly men of the district in the person of Mr James McKittrick who was gathered to his fathers on Monday night of this week, after an illness extending over a few weeks, from uraemic poisoning. Mr McKittrick was a man who never obtruded himself prominently in public matters, but was one of the outstanding supporters of the Methodist church here, being one of the most liberal givers, and also a class leader for for many years. He followed farming all his life, and with marked success. He was prudent in his management, greatly improved his property, erecting upon them substantial modern buildings. He was thoroughly honest and honorable in all his dealings, and held the esteem and respect of all who knew him.

Mr McKittrick was born near Ottawa and came to this part about 42 years ago, farming in Greenock about three years before buying the present farm on 12th Bruce. He married Mary Crawford, who survives him. The living members of the family are three sons—William and Milton at home, and Rev John McKittrick, B A, pastor of a Methodist congregation at Chicago Heights, Ill. Two brothers of deceased and four sisters survive him—William in Vancouver; John at Crystal City, Man; Mrs D Shanks, of Hannah, N D; Mrs Spearman of Crystal City, Man; Mrs Lever of Carleton Place, and Mrs McClinton of Paisley.

The funeral takes place from the family residence on Thursday afternoon to State Vale Cemetery.

ROBERT HAMILTON

One by one the well known figures of old residents are being removed from the scenes of life's activities, and this week we have to chronicle the death of another who has been a citizen of the town and vicinity for about half a century. Mr Robert Hamilton passed away on Sunday morning after a short attack of illness that seemed to be of a paralytic nature. The deceased was born in Stonehouse, Lanarkshire, Scotland, and some 56 years ago crossed the Atlantic, landing at New York, remaining in that city only a short time. There he married Miss Jane Wilson and very soon after they came to Ontario, making their home at Beaverton for a short time before removing to Paisley, and in this locality and village they lived continuously since. Besides the aged widow, a family of four sons and two daughters survive—John in Paisley, Robert in the west, Archie and Thomas at the Soo, Mrs McConnell at Little Current, and Mrs Gooch in Toronto. The funeral on Monday afternoon was conducted by Rev Mr Facey, and interment was made in Paisley cemetery.

JAMES C. McDERMAID

Mr John McDermaid of Gillies Hill received a sad message on Monday, being an intimation of the death of his eldest son, James C, who for 23 years has been in the west. His death occurred on Saturday in an hospital at Rochester, Minn., where he had been operated on for appendicitis just three days previous. The late Mr McDermaid had been farming at Osage, Sask., until he went last year to live in Regina. He was twice married and is survived by his second wife, also a family of four grown-up children by his first wife.

Millaray has quite an industry in the ice-cutting operations on the millpond alongside the railway track. The Gazette says that a trainload of thirteen cars of ice per day is harvested. About twenty men are employed at present, and the force will be doubled shortly. Three hundred carloads will be shipped from there.

Tenders for Erection of School House

SEALED tenders will be received by the undersigned up to and including Feb 25th, for the work and material required for erection of a brick schoolhouse for U.S.S. No. 16 Brant & Greenock, according to plans and specifications to be seen at the residence of the undersigned. Separate tenders will also be received for supply and deliver by June 1st, 1918, (1) 70 yards of clean concrete gravel, (2) 25 loads of stones for concrete work. (3) 45 yards of sand, (4) excavating basement and digging drains. A marked cheque for 10 per cent of the contract price to accompany each tender. The lowest or any tender not necessarily accepted. Weak Women!

Some women are weak because of ills that are common

In Girlhood—Womanhood and Motherhood

The prescription which Dr. R. V. Pierce used most successfully—in diseases of women—which has stood the test of nearly half a century—is

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription

Take this in liquid or tablet form as a tonic.

Mrs. Kate D. Richardson, of Beasley, Essex Co., Va., says, "I endeavor to be a pleasure to my husband and I owe it all to Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. For some years I suffered greatly with weakness. I was troubled by frequent headaches and peculiarly grew worse. One of my friends told me of the good results of your Favorite Prescription. I went to the drug store and got a bottle, and after taking it, with the 'Pleasant Pellets,' I commenced to get well. I continued to get better and better, for I was always sick and complaining and made others as well as myself unhappy. So you see what a debt I owe you!"

PATRIOTISM and PRODUCTION

The Empire's Call to Farmers

"Approximately twenty million men have been mobilized in Europe. A large proportion of these have been withdrawn from the farms of the countries at war. Even in neutral countries large numbers of food producers have been called from the land to be ready for emergencies. It is difficult for us to realize what will be the effect on food production through the withdrawal of several million men from all the great agricultural countries of Europe. These millions cease to be producers, they have become consumers, —worse still, they have become destroyers of food."

HON. MARTIN BURRELL, Minister of Agriculture.

Britain must have food—food this year, and food next year. Britain is looking to Canada to supply most of that food. We are sending our surplus now, but we must prepare for a larger surplus this year and next year. Patriotism and Production must go hand in hand

ATTEND YOUR CONFERENCE

Because of this need of the Empire for more food, and the call to Canada in that need, the Canadian Department of Agriculture has arranged for a series of Conferences throughout the Dominion with the object of giving suggestions as to the best ways of increasing production of the particular products needed at this time. At these conferences agricultural specialists, who have studied agricultural conditions and production throughout the world, and the best means of increasing agricultural production in Canada, will give valuable information and suggestions to the farmers, live-stockmen, dairymen, poultrymen, vegetable growers, and other producers of this country. The Canadian Department of Agriculture urges you to attend as many of these Conferences as possible, also to watch for other information on the subject that will be given in other announcements in this newspaper.

Put Energy into Production of Staple Foods

The Government does not ask farmers to work harder, so much as it urges them to make their work more productive, and to produce those staple foods that the Empire most needs and that can be most easily stored and transported.

Europe, and particularly Britain, will need the following staple foods from Canada more than ever before:—

Wheat, oats, corn, beans, peas, Beef, mutton, bacon and ham. Cheese and butter. Poultry and eggs. Vegetables, such as potatoes, onions, and turnips.

The larger the yield of these staple food products, the greater the service to the Empire. Germany in the last ten years has doubled the average yield of the majority of her field crops largely through better seed, thorough cultivation and use of fertiliser. And while the Empire's armies are busy putting down German Militarism, let us at home appropriate the best of Germany's agricultural methods for the Empire's advantage.

The Government urges farmers, stockmen, dairymen and other producers to make a wider use of the Free Bulletins issued by the Canadian Department of Agriculture. Clip out, fill in and mail the coupon below and get a list of these bulletins. Then select the bulletins that will be of value to you. Mail your coupon right now. Do not put a stamp on the envelope. Your coupon will be "On His Majesty's Service."

NOT GALLEYS OF FICTION

THE "HULKS" OF TO-DAY ARE OCEAN LINERS.

German Prisoners in England Occupy Very Comfortable Quarters.

Not only the homeless who tramp the wind-swept Embankment or who sleep on the stone pavements of London, but even the average workingman of England might well envy the comforts which the German prisoners in England are receiving. After visiting several places of detention on board ship I might say that if I were "broke" and friendless it would be a strong temptation to declare myself an "alien enemy" and be interned, writes an American correspondent from London.

A short while ago one of the London papers published a paragraph which was phrased, "The German prisoners at Newbury have been removed to hulks on the south coast." This immediately conjured a vision of the dank galleys of fiction or places of confinement like that typified in the horrible Australian convict ship.

Gruesome imagination was replaced by a more surprising sensation when I learned that these "hulks" consisted of the Cunard liners Saxonia, Ivernia and Ascania and other liners such as the Scotian, Canada and Manitoba.

My first visit was to three of the "hulks" at Portsmouth. Anchored well up in the inner harbor were the Ascania, Manitoba, and Scotian. The Scotian is reserved for military prisoners, the others being used for civilians.

A crew of six with the word Mainz on their hat bands rowed me out from the Admiralty pier, the military touch being provided by a "Tommy Atkins" seated in the stern with a loaded rifle. The men were survivors of the Mainz, sunk in the fight off the Bight of Heligoland. "Fine fellows," said one of the English officers to me afterwards. "I'd be willing to back them against any boat crew in the English navy."

Prisoners Have Regatta.

Incidentally this crew just walked away with two other prisoner crews in one of the most peculiar regattas in history. On Christmas Day a boat race, composed of prisoners from each of the three ships, raced over a mile course. In each boat was an armed sentry urging his crew to the utmost efforts.

Aboard the Ascania, which is the flagship of the fleet, I found 1,097 prisoners. Her transatlantic steerage accommodation is 1,650, so she can hardly be called overcrowded. The prisoners have the entire run of the ship save the upper promenade deck, which is reserved for the English officers and soldiers. This also applies to the other ships.

The bulk of the prisoners are accommodated in the ordinary steerage manner save that they have in their bunks a supposing sort of mattress, a soft pillow and three warm blankets.

There is no stint of either steam heat or electric light. Bathing facilities are extensive, and there is practically an unlimited supply of hot and cold fresh and salt water. The daily consumption of fresh water on the Ascania is from seventy to ninety tons.

The only complaint about the food was that white instead of black bread was served. Comparatively few Germans save those who have lived in England for many years care for white bread so on the three ships German bakers have been put to work and the prisoners are happy. Among the military prisoners there were complaints that the bill of fare did not include sufficient sausages and German dishes, so four German cooks have been put to work in the galleys to cook distinctive German dishes. These cooks and bakers are paid regular wages.

The majority of civilian prisoners are waiters, barbers and people in that or lower strata of life. Those of a better class have cabins, but the food rations are uniform.

What Prisoners May Receive.

Prisoners may write two letters a week on War Office note paper. There is no limit to the number of letters or parcels they may receive. All letters sent and received are censored. All parcels are examined before being delivered, but aside from gunpowder, weapons, liquor, candles, electric flashlights, and similar things, there are very few things that a prisoner may not receive. As far as money is concerned prisoners may receive all their friends send them. The commandant encourages the prisoners not to have big sums in their possession on account of the danger of robbery, and urges them to deposit the money in the purser's safe and draw it as it is needed.

After the parcels and letters are examined they are distributed by the prisoners, who have organized an efficient post office of their own.

Prisoners who arrive in a destitute condition as far as clothing is concerned are more than generously treated. The authorities furnish without charge heavy frieze ulsters with hood collars and suits of a similar material. The underwear and socks are wool and the flannel shirts cost the Government just under a dollar each wholesale. The boots are heavy and well made.

Conditions aboard the two other ships are practically the same. The routine rations are alike. The Manitoba has 1,003 prisoners with a certified steerage accommodation of 1,603, while the Scotian has 1,228 with a steerage accommodation of 1,520.

On the Scotian the men and the non-commissioned officers occupy different parts of the ship, the latter having first-class cabins and using the first-class dining saloon for their meals. The military distinction of rank obtains strictly aboard the Scotian not by any insistence on the part of the English, but on the part of the Germans themselves, to whom rank is rank whether in the fighting line or in a detention ship.

At Southampton there are two detention places ashore. One is at Shirley, one of the suburbs, where a large skating rink has been turned into a receiving station.

At Bevois, Mount House, in another suburb of Southampton, is a place for German officers.

GREAT AGE OF THE EARTH.

Solid Crust Formed From 20,000,000 to 40,000,000 Years Ago.

In order to estimate the age of the earth different phenomena may be used. First, the separation of the moon; secondly, the solidification of the earth's crust, then the condensation of the aqueous vapor and the formation of oceans. The quantity of salt dissolved in these oceans and the thickness of the geological layers, especially those of a calcareous nature afford further arguments.

According to George Darwin the moon was separated from our globe about 56,000,000 years ago. The age of the solid crust has been calculated by Lord Kelvin from the increase of the temperature in deep mines. In some regions the temperature is seen to increase about one degree for every 50 meters; in others, however, one degree for 100 meters. On the average the considerations of Lord Kelvin gave an age of 20,000,000 to 40,000,000 years in the solid crust of the earth.

The quantity of salt obviously increases in the oceans on account of the salt added by the rivers and of the evaporation of the water. The total quantity of this salt has been calculated and the quantities of the yearly supply of water are known for all the larger streams, as well as their percentage of salt. For these data we may calculate the annual increase of salt in the oceans and find how many years would be required for our present rivers to accumulate all the salt now found in the seas. According to Joly, about 50,000,000 years would be necessary. But obviously the rivers must exhaust the mountains which they drain, and formerly these must have been much richer in salts. This consideration must lead us to diminish the number of years required in a very sensible manner.

The age of the geological strata has been deduced from their thickness and the velocity of the process of sedimentation. Sollas estimates the total thickness of about 50 kilometers and the average rate of deposition of the layers at 50 centimeters per century. From these numbers we may find an age of 25,000,000 years for the collective deposition of all its geological layers. Calcareous rocks have been built by organisms and mainly by corals and mollusces. These have made use of the lime added to the sea by the rivers. Dubois has calculated on the one hand the whole thickness of these rocks and on the other the yearly supply of lime from the rivers. He concludes that 8,000,000 or 35,000,000 years would be required to produce the whole of this system.

RAGGING GERMAN OFFICERS.

Antwerp Boys Get Their Fun Out of Their Rude Conquerors.

The Belgian boys are getting their fun out of the German occupation of Antwerp, however, and their "ragging" of the hated invader affords the townspeople a good deal of amusement. A favorite occupation of the street game is this: A squad of about 20 little urchins, dressed in paper hats and leggings, and carrying wooden swords—at sight one may often see in this country—struts along the street under the command of a "captain." On the "company" arriving in front of the principal hotel where the German officers are staying, the "captain" calls "Halt"—in German, of course, for the youngsters have learnt many of the German military words of command—and the "company" at once stops dead.

Having thus secured the attention of the German officers, the "captain" shouts out as loud as he can, "To Paris!" whereupon the whole of his "command" commence walking backwards. The whole thing is so cleverly carried out that one is bound to laugh—so long as you are not a German officer.

Limited Popularity.

"Is Jones a popular fellow?"

"Well, he is quite a favorite with himself."

NEWS OF THE MIDDLE WEST

BETWEEN ONTARIO AND BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Items From Provinces Where Many Ontario Boys and Girls Are Living.

At Saskatoon, over $40,000 in taxes was paid in December.

The civic budget of Saskatoon for 1915 is $153,000 less than in 1914.

There is a scarcity of calves in the Selkirk, Man., district this season.

At Deerwood, Man., Mr. Blanchard sold his half section of land for $10,000.

Up to the end of December, 2,230 alien enemies had been registered at Winnipeg.

An experimental farm will be started at Morden, Man., by the Dominion Government.

Cochrane, Alberta, gave a carload of bacon for war purposes, also over $8,000 to different funds.

In Saskatoon during 1914, 526 men and women were trained in home nursing and first aid work.

At Sundre, Alberta, Neil Grant and Tom Siddon exchanged sisters as brides on the same day.

Melville, Sask., has a rink that accommodates 1,400 people — or about the population of the town.

Homestead entries in Saskatchewan for December fell off to less than half of what they were in 1913.

The Moose Jaw police force has been reduced by four dismissed and a sergeant cut down to the ranks.

The Livestock Association of Manitoba urged all farmers to hold their stock, and not sell on the present low market.

At Portage La Prairie, stamps sold at the local post office were $90 less during December, 1914, than for the same month in 1913.

The customary dog races held on the streets of Regina every New Year's morning were called off this year owing to lack of interest.

At Kenville, Man., rabbits are so numerous that they are a pest to the farmers. They have destroyed hundreds of fruit bushes in the gardens.

The Killam, Alberta, people have decided that their water system is insufficient, and are accordingly proceeding to have the town well re-located.

A man named A. E. Bedford, arrested, drunk on the street at Winnipeg, was taken to the police station and found dead in his cell three hours later.

Prof. Bedford, Deputy Minister of Agriculture for Manitoba, says prospects for improved agricultural yields and better farming in the west were never brighter.

Charles Brooks, Constable Miller and several military men, seized more than 100 guns, rifles and revolvers from Austrians and Germans living around Stuartburn, Man.

Mrs. Kortel, of Headingly, Man., lighted a fire with coal oil on Dec. 29, being severely burned in the accompanying explosion. On Dec. 31 she died in a Winnipeg hospital.

Two brothers, Edward and Ernest Byee, near Enfoll, Sask., were alleged to have quarrelled. The latter is said to have fired a gun at the former, who retaliated by hitting his brother with an axe, severely wounding him.

Winnipeg will be paid $200,000 by the C.P.R., according to the promise of the company made August 12, 1907, to the effect that the amount would be contributed to the city when it had undertaken to provide a permanent water supply and the first check of $200,000 has been handed to the Mayor.

At the military camp near Calgary there was a court-martial on a young soldier who had enlisted in an infantry regiment. When a mounted regiment was wanted he deserted from the infantry and joined the cavalry. The court-martial sentenced him to be discharged.

Anything Else.

"You must push matters a little, James," said a chemist to his new boy, "by calling a customer's attention to this article and that article, you often effect a sale."

"Yes, sir," responded the new boy, and then he hastened to wait upon an elderly person who wanted a stamp. "Anything else, mum?" inquired the ambitious boy, politely; "hair dye, cosmetic, face powder, rheumatic drops, belladonna, mule destroyer——" The elderly lady deals over the way now.

In Utter Disgust.

"Willie!" exclaimed his mother, shocked and grieved. "How often have I told you not to play with that naughty Johnson boy?" "Mamma," said William, who appeared in a regrettable state of disorder, and with a bruised face, in utter disgust, "Do I look as if I had been playing with anybody?"

Envy.

"Oh, dear, I wish I was a turtle."

"What an absurd idea! Why?"

"A turtle has a snap."

A MOUNTAIN EXPEDITION.

An Unpleasant Day Spent in Saskatchewan.

The sides of the mountain were ragged and rocky, writes Mr. Washburn, and every few minutes we would trip over boulders, cutting our hands and barking our shins; but no crusader, bent on the capture of Jerusalem, was ever so keen on the job as our mountain climber.

By and by we got up to about ten thousand feet. I suggested that we could see the view from this point as well as from the top, but at this I got a look from our leader that nearly froze my blood in my veins. What had gone before was merely child's play to what was to come. Long fingers of ice and snow reaching down from the summit had to be crossed again and again. Every time we crossed one of these the expert would exclaim to us that a single false move would precipitate us to a sudden death, which looked perfectly feasible to me.

After we got over some dangerous ledges and on to firmer footing, with our hair standing on end,—I speak particularly of my own,—the mountain climber would sit down in great glee and explain to us how any moment we might be carried off with an avalanche, and back up his statement by a dozen anecdotes about sudden deaths in similar places.

Finally we came to an abrupt ledge of ice. "Ha!" said our leader. "We must cut our way in this ice step by step, but remember, fellows, a single false move, and naught but our crushed and mangled bodies will remain to tell the tale."

I did not want to be a crushed and mangled body, neither did "Doc," and in desperation we both said so. The mountain climber looked at us in disgust, and pointed out that another thousand feet would see us at the summit. We would go down through the annals of history as the conquerors of Mount Whatever-It-Was. We objected that we stood a better chance of going down into the ravine. Anyhow, we said that we would wait while he climbed up the annals of history to his own glory. The mountain climber was very much annoyed, and said he would go on alone, at which we all shook hands, and off he started. After twenty minutes of fiddling about, he came back and said he could not make it alone, so we turned and started for camp, which we reached at ten that night.

A MADDENED JAGUAR.

Most Dangerous and Powerful Animal in the New World.

There is a story of a fierce charge by an infuriated Mexican jaguar in an article that Mr. Harry H. Dunn writes in the Outing Magazine. A wooded hill, surrounded on two sides by water, and on the other two by grass cropped short by the village goats, was set on fire to drive out the beast, which had taken refuge there.

Animals began to come from the tangle. Parrots, disturbed from their midday rest, flew in green and red and yellow clouds. Monkeys fled through the tops of the trees. Rabbits, and rats, and mice scurried underfoot, and we saw one ocelot, a little spotted jungle cat.

Then came the jaguar. Crossing the sloping side of the hill, the tiger appeared to Felipe; and the latter, proud of the 73 repeater I had brought with me from Mexico City for him, fired as the spotted apparition crossed an open space in the tangle. Ordinarily, Felipe is a good shot; but the rifle was new to him, and he managed only to put the slug in the cat's fore shoulder. The tiger screamed, and leaped straight up into the air. When he came down, all thought of flight had left him, and he headed for Felipe and myself. The Indian began to pump bullets at the tiger, and I remember noticing that the cat was not leaping or running, but trotting rapidly as a house cat trots unfrightened about its own home.

We were confronting the most dangerous and most powerful animal in the New World, with the single exception of the Kodiak bear, and I doubt very much if any bear in the world could whip a maddened Mexican tiger. The jaguar's mouth was open, and his tail streamed straight out behind; he did not lash it from side to side, as I should have expected him to do.

At ten yards, Felipe had emptied his magazine, dropped his rifle and whipped out his machete, when I found the tiger's forehead over the sights of the rifle. As the gun cracked, the jaguar halted, staggered forward a short step or two, sank to his fore shoulders, and turned over, dead.

A well-known Scottish architect travelling in Palestine recently, when news reached him of an addition to his family circle. The happy father immediately provided himself with some water from the Jordan to carry home for the christening of the infant, and returned to Scotland. On the Sunday appointed for the ceremony he duly presented himself at the church and sought out the beadle in order to hand over the precious water to his care. He pulled the flask from his pocket, but the beadle held up a warning hand and came near to whisper: "No the noo, Sir; no the noo! Maybe after the kirk's out."

TELLING FORTUNES.

What the Signs Mean in the Teacup Leaves.

Telling fortunes by teacups is great fun. As in crystal gazing a vivid imagination is absolutely essential. So, also, is a ready tongue.

There are, however, certain rules and signs in telling fortunes by teacups, which it will be necessary to learn if you want to have the means of entertaining others at your finger-ends.

When your guest has finished her tea get her to turn over the cup and place it upside down in its saucer before handing it to you.

Take up the cup very gently so that the arrangement of the tea-leaves is disturbed as little as possible, and then proceed to tell the fortune.

It is not to be expected on taking up the cup that the figures will be accurately represented, and it is quite sufficient if they bear some likeness to any of the emblems; the more fertile the fancy of the person who inspects the cup the more he or she will see in it.

Again, cleverness in noting facial characteristics and general tendencies will help wonderfully in giving an interesting and accurate fortune. Here are the signs:—

The leaf of clover—A lucky sign. If it is on the top of the cup the fortune is not far distant, but it is subject to delay if it is in the middle of the bottom. Should clouds surround it there may be something disagreeable attending it, but if it is clear the happiness is undisturbed.

The serpent—Falsehood and enmity and the sign of an enemy. By letter which is frequently near the emblem the initial of his name may be guessed.

The letter—If the letter is clear it denotes the speedy arrival of welcome news. If surrounded by dots money will come. If hemmed in by clouds bad tidings. If accompanied by a heart lovers may expect a letter.

The star—Denotes happiness in the clear part and at the top of the cup. If dots are about it is great good luck. Several stars denote children; but surrounded by dashes that they will give you trouble.

The dog—At the top of the cup, faithful friend. At the bottom, that the person will have to dread the effects of jealousy.

The lily—In the clear the lily betokens happy life, but if clouded it portends trouble from one's relations.

The cross—One or more adversities; if at the top of the cup the trouble will soon end, but if at the bottom the person may expect many trials.

The clouds—If they are lighter than darker good results from one's hopes, but if they are black give it up.

The sun—Great luck if it is in the clear, but in the thick it denotes much sadness, and if surrounded by dots and dashes an alteration will soon take place.

The moon—If it appears in the clear it denotes high honors, but in the dark sadness. If it is in the bottom of the cup the consulting party will be lucky both on water and land.

Mountains—If it represents only a mountain it means people of high rank, but several of them in the thick are signs of powerful enemies.

The tree—One tree only in the clear or thick part, lasting good health; several trees, that your wishes will be accomplished. If they are not separated with dashes your good fortune will require some time to mature, but if they are dots it is a sign that you will make your fortune in the country where you reside.

The child—In the clear part, great friendship with some one of the other sex. In the thick, excess in love. In the bottom of the cup it stands for a great disaster in love.

There comes a time in the life of every man when he feels justified in kicking himself.

A wearied young lady hastened the departure of a tedious caller by remarking as she looked out of the window, "I think we are going to have a beautiful sunrise."

BRUTAL METHODS THE RULE.

A PRISONER'S EXPERIENCE IN ANTWERP.

Imprisoned Because He Had British Passport and Very Badly Treated.

Some stories of life in Antwerp are related in the London Daily Telegraph by J. Marten, a Dutch gentleman, who had just returned to London from that city. I went to Antwerp on business on Dec. 16, he remarked, and took with me thirty letters, including some correspondence from a number of wounded Belgian soldiers to their parents and families in Antwerp and Brussels. On arriving at the frontier the Germans at once wanted to arrest me, because of the letters I had on me; but as I voluntarily surrendered these they let me pass. I got to Antwerp all right, but when I applied there for a passport to Brussels, I at once got into trouble. I should mention that my passport had been vised at Folkstone by the officials there, but the English mark seemed to have escaped the German examiner's eye until I applied for a passport to Brussels.

Fatal English Stamp.

The fatal English stamp on my old passport proved my undoing here, for the official, on seeing it, at once suspected that I was an Englishspy; and I was immediately arrested. The officer in charge of my case was a dog of a man. He told the sentry who marched me off that he was to shoot me on the least attempt I made to escape, and told me at the same time that I would be shot if I tried to run away—rather superfluous advice to an unarmed man in the company of a soldier with a loaded rifle and fixed bayonet. My guard was a mere schap—a soldier from Alsace. I was kept waiting for four hours, and then food was supplied to my guard and myself. In the afternoon I was sent before the Military Governor, and was kept waiting an hour. I was then told I should be examined in the morning, and my guard was changed. The way I was subsequently dealt with was brutal. I was treated as a thief or a murderer. I was put in a cell, and my meals were served me by criminals.

Fed on Dry Bread.

I was fed on dry bread only, and allowed the small period of half an hour for exercise daily. On the fourth day I got my first dinner from outside, for which you may be sure I had to pay. All my money was afterwards taken from me. The stone cell in which I was placed was warmed, but not enough, and I was miserably cold. I was allowed a few books to read, but my chief occupation was wondering what would become of me. They wanted me to take a bath when I was first put into prison, but the water was so filthy that I shuddered at the prospect of bathing in it and refused. During all this time my firm, Messrs. Kime Brothers, of London and Amsterdam, had been using every endeavor to effect my release, and eventually the Dutch Minister at The Hague himself telephoned direct to the Military Governor at Antwerp demanding my freedom, and I was permitted to go.

The Children.

Be loving to your children. Bear with their failings. They come by them naturally enough. The parents are but too often reflected in the children. They resemble each other morally, as well as physically. The love we expect from them, first show them how to bestow. Never correct them when you are in anger. Punish them only to correct them; never to vent your malice or spite. Let them come to you with their confidence and with the burden of their sorrow. Don't freeze their warm young hearts by indifference to their hopes. Draw them to you in the bond of love, and let your heart beat against theirs as they come to you with their cares or confessions. Let them grow in the bright sunshine of your love, and they will flood your path with the sunlight of their affections.

If Catarrh keeps You Hawking Use "Catarrhozone"-The Quickest Cure

Nothing Known So Sure For Throat Weakness, Bronchial Trouble, &c.

No doctor attempts to-day to cure a genuine case of catarrh or bronchitis except by the inhalation method. Stomach dosing has been discarded because useless medicine so taken affects only the stomach—never reaches the seat of catarrh.

The advanced physician recognizes that only air can be sent into the lungs and bronchial tubes. Fill this air with healing medicaments and you solve the problem. No combination of antiseptics is so successful as Catarrhozone. It contains the richest pine balsams and the greatest healers known.

One breath of Catarrhozone instantly circulates over the area that is afflicted with catarrh. Relief is instant—suffering stops at once—germs are destroyed—every taint of disease is removed. Think it over seriously. Here is a remedy that clears the throat, relieves hoarseness, coughing and bad breath. Irritating phlegm is cleared out, inflamed bronchial tubes are healed, throat and voice are strengthened.

Catarrhozone is pleasant and certain. You breathe Catarrhozone—you don't take it. Large $1.00 size is guaranteed; smaller size 50c, and trial size 25c, at all dealers everywhere.

ALMOST EVERY ONE NEEDS A TONIC

Almost everyone — man, woman and child—needs a tonic at some time. It is often said that a man is lazy because he takes little or no interest in his work; but the truth is he is not well. He needs a tonic. The same is true of a woman who does not hustle over her home work, but only feels fit to be in bed. She is not merely tired, but ill. A dull pain in the head or back, poor appetite, loss of strength with low spirits and loss of interest in life show that you need a tonic to brace up the nerves and give you a new lease of life. The proof is that when the right tonic is taken all the trouble quickly disappears. The one tonic—the only tonic—for weak and ailing men, women and children is Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, which speedily bring back abundant health, strength and energy. They have done this in thousands and thousands of cases as is proved by the following. Mr. Ed. D. Owen, Burdett, Alta., says:—"About two years ago my health was in a wretched condition. My whole system seemed to be run down and the doctor seemed puzzled at my condition. I had no appetite, exertion would leave me breathless, and I was troubled much with dizziness. All the medicine I took did me no good, and I was steadily growing weaker. My mother urged me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and before I had taken them very long I began to feel like a new man, and continuing their use, I was restored to complete health. I now recommend them to all run down in health as they are the best medicine I know of."

Sold by all medicine dealers, or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50, from The Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

VISION.

Dr. James L. Hughes, Toronto.

To see is greater than to know,
So I shall pray
That I may see a clearer glow
Of truth each day.

Though I know all that man has known
Blind I may be;
There is some glory I alone
Have power to see.

My vision, I must surely see,
Or fail to do
My work to make the future be
More grandly true.

Faith should be ever turned to sight,
So I shall try
To find new stars to give fresh light
On life's wide sky.

A Test for Maple Sugar.

A quick way of determining the purity of maple sugar, which has recently been put into practical use, depends upon the difference in electrical resistance of impure and pure sugar. Standards of resistance were determined by sending a current through a solution of pure sugar, and then by making similar tests with sugar adulterated by the ordinary methods. It is not only a simple matter to determine whether the sugar is or is not adulterated, but the form of adulterant is also usually indicated by the degrees of resistance.

OUR NATIONAL DISEASE

Caused by Tea and Coffee.

Physicians know that drugs will not correct the evils caused by tea or coffee and that the only remedy is to stop drinking it.

A doctor says:

"I was a coffee drinker for many years, and often thought that I could not do without it, but after years of suffering with our national malady, dyspepsia, I attributed it to the drinking of coffee, and after some thought determined to use Postum for my morning drink. (The effects on the system of tea and coffee drinking are very similar, because they each contain the drug, caffeine.)

"I had the Postum made carefully according to directions on the pkg. and found it just suited my taste.

"At first I used it only for breakfast, but I found myself getting as much better that I had it at all meals, and I am pleased to say that I have been relieved of indigestion. I gained 10 pounds in 4 months and my general health is greatly improved.

"I must tell you of a young lady. She had been in ill health for many years, the vital forces low, with but little pain. I wrote her of the good that Postum did me and advised her to try it.

"At the end of the year she wrote me that she had gained 40 pounds in weight and felt like herself again."

Name given by Canadian Postum Co., Windsor, Ont. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum — must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of cold water, and with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

"There's a Reason" for Postum. —Sold by Grocers.

New British Chief of Imperial Staff.

The photo shows Lieut.-Gen. Sir James Wolfe Murray, K.C.B., appointed chief of the Imperial General Staff in succession to the late General Sir C. W. H. Douglas, G.C.B. Born in 1853, the new chief of the Imperial General Staff was educated at Glenalmond, Harrow, and the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich. He entered the Royal Artillery in 1872. As Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel he served in the Ashanti War of 1876, being in command of lines of communication. He was commanding lines of communication in Natal during the South African campaign, and was twice mentioned in despatches. Colonel in 1900, he was created K.C.B. in the following year. He was Quartermaster of India in 1903-4. Master-General of the Ordnance 1904-7, and, in command of the 9th (Secunderabad) Division India, 1907-11.

BABY'S BATTLES

Baby's battles for health can be easily won if the mother will constantly keep at hand the means of aiding her little ones when the emergency may arise. Baby's Own Tablets should be found in every home where there are small children. The Tablets are a gentle but thorough laxative. They break up colds; relieve croup; prevent constipation; cure indigestion; promote sleep, and in fact cure all the minor ills of little ones. They are sold by all medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

COMMANDER SAMSON.

Kaiser Offers $5,000 for Him, Dead or Alive.

"A flying Captain Kettle," is the term applied to Commander Samson by his colleagues in the British Naval Air Service, for the brilliant aviator, with his small, well-knit frame and pointed beard, bears a remarkable resemblance to the well-known sea captain of fiction. His feats in the present war have so impressed the Kaiser that he has offered $5,000 reward to anyone who will bring him to Berlin alive or dead.

Commander Samson is one of our cleverest naval flyers, and a short time back he did much to organize the Naval Air Service of Great Britain, which is generally recognized to be the most efficient in the world. When the commander first became associated with this branch of the service it practically existed only in the form of a blue-papered docket resting in a pigeon-hole at the Admiralty. That was little over a year ago, and now the British aeroplane service is a solid bulwark between Britain and its foes. Night and day its members are guarding Britain's shores from invasion by hostile aircraft, as well as conducting transports across the English Channel. Commander Samson has had much to do with this rapid growth. In addition to being a clever organizer and commander of men, this famous naval man is a born flyer, and few men can handle the great 120 horsepower seaplanes of the navy so skillfully. These machines weigh over one ton, and they have to be landed on ocean rollers at a speed of sixty miles an hour. On one occasion Comander Samson, through the reflection of the waves, misjudged the drop to water and dived underneath it. The force of hitting the water at high speed crushed him against the engine at his back, but, though stunned by the fall, he managed to fight his way through the wires and struts which threatened to strangle him and reach the surface alive.

His past training as a sailor has resulted in the commander developing into a typical "handy man." In the early days of the war he forsook his flying for a short while and took command of an armored motor car. It was this vehicle which succeed in annihilating a brigade of German cavalry by dashing into them at a great speed, mowing many down with the car itself, whilst the gunners behind the shot-proof walls accounted for the rest.

Although bearded, Commander Samson is in the early "thirties," and he is considered to be the ideal type of aviator, for the recklessness of youth in his case is leavened by the experience of years.

It costs more to revenge injuries than to bear them.

"What are you anyway," contemptuously inquired Mrs. Peck during the quarrel, "a man or a mouse?" "A man," answered Henry Peck bitterly. "If I were a mouse I'd have you up on that table right now yelling for help."

She Was In Bed For Seven Weeks

THEN DODD'S KIDNEY PILLS CURED MADAME BERUBE.

Montreal Lady Tells How, After Four Years' Illness, She Found a Complete Cure For All Her Troubles.

Montreal, Que., Feby. 1st (Special)—Madame J. Baptiste Berube, residing at 1203 Logan Avenue, this city, asserts that after four years' suffering from kidney disease she has been completely restored to health by Dodd's Kidney Pills.

"I had a pain in my left side around the heart," Madame Berube says in her statement. "I suffered constantly with headache and backache, and for seven weeks I was in bed with kidney disease and feebleness. The doctor could not help me, so I decided to try Dodd's Kidney Pills.

"After the first box I was some better. I continued to use Dodd's Kidney Pills till now the palpitation has left me, and I am a well woman, able to do my work. Dodd's Kidney Pills cured me and I recommend them to all persons who suffer as I did."

Notice how many women are rising to tell their suffering sisters they can find relief in Dodd's Kidney Pills. The reason is that nine-tenths of women's ills spring from diseased or disordered kidneys. Every woman whose kidneys show signs of weakness should use Dodd's Kidney Pills.

Navigation Explained.

The Gurkas, who came from India to France to take their place in the British firing line, were sometimes very amusing during the long voyage to Europe. When they had been at sea two whole days without seeing land, writes an English officer to the London Times, they became very much disturbed in mind. "Without doubt, the captain of the ship has lost his way," they said, but they counseled together and decided at last that all was well. Some one asked them why they reached this decision. They led him to the stern of the vessel and pointed to the long wake of water boiling behind them, and said with a smile as broad as the greatness of the discovery, "Without doubt he follows the path."

Wellington's Blunt Phrase.

Certainly most of Wellington's remarks about the British soldier are not likely to be echoed by any commander-in-chief of the present day. But there is one, uttered to Mr Creevey before the battle of Waterloo, which with all its bluntness is thoroughly appropriate to the position to-day. They were watching a British infantry solier entering a park at Brussels. "There," said the Duke, pointing to the man; "it all depends upon that article whether we do the business or not. Give me enough of it, and I am sure."—London Chronicle.

Another Rumor.

"I have some astonishing news for you, Maria," said Brown. "In addition to the war Britain is on the eve of a great strike, in which thousands upon thousands of hands will be involved." "What a dreadful thing!" ejaculated his unsuspecting victim. "When is it to take place?" "This very night, my dear," answered Brown, gravely. "At midnight thousands of clock hands will point to the hour and it will strike twelve."

Joint and Muscle Pains Banished by Nerviline

IT CURES RHEUMATISM.

Thousands of people, chuck full of the joy of living—happy, glad, bright people, that Nerviline has cured of their pains, all tell the same wonderful story of its power to drive out the aches and tortures of rheumatism and kindred ills.

"My goodness, but Nerviline is a miracle-worker," writes Mrs. Charlotte Chipman, mother of a well-known family residing at Mount-Pleasant. "Last month I was so crippled up with sciatica and muscular rheumatism as to be almost unable to do a bit of housework. My joints were so stiff and the muscles so frightfully sore that I even cried at times with the pain. For years we have used Nerviline in our family and I just got busy with this wonderful, good old liniment. Lots of rubbing with Nerviline soon relieved my misery and I was in a real short time about my work as usual."

No matter where the ache is, no matter how distressing the pain you can rub it away with Nerviline. For forty years it has been curing lumbago, sciatica, back-ache, colds, chest trouble and all sorts of winter ills. Keep a large 50c. family size bottle handy and you'll be saved lots of trouble and have smaller doctor bills. Small trial size 25c. at dealers everywhere.

"Doctor" Jellicoe.

When Mr. Churchill told the British House of Commons that the health of the sailors was nearly twice as good as in times of peace he raised a cheer and a laugh. He might have added that "Doctor" Jellicoe was very largely responsible for this happy state of affairs, for certainly no commander-in-chief has ever more jealously watched over his men than the present commander-in-chief of the grand fleet. His first care is food supply, second clothes, and third recreation; and Lady Jellicoe seems to be acting as a remarkably energetic member of his "staff" on shore to see that he gets all he wants in the way of comforts for his "chickens."

The Cigarette and War.

The cigarette has already figured in many stirring scenes, and even in the shadow of death it has been Tommy's close friend. Who will forget the gallant commander of the Formidable going down coolly making his last cigarette! Who will forget the sailors lighting their pipes when they knew their ship was doomed! "Give us a smoke" has been the last words of many a dying hero. It has brought a smile to the wounded Tommy and has comforted him in pain and hunger since the war began.

KETTLE VALLEY RAILWAY.

Links Up the C.P.R. with United States Railways.

What the completion of the Kettle Valley Railway will mean to transcontinental traffic, both freight and passenger, was explained to by Mr. J. J. Warren, the president of the company, who has been spending a few days east. For years past the Canadian Pacific Railway has been wrestling with the problem of reducing grades in the Rocky Mountain section, and it is probable that it will continue to struggle for years to come. Even in days when expansion work is necessarily restricted and curtailed, orders are given, for example, to push the work on the Rogers Pass tunnel to completion. But with the Kettle Valley Railway and the Kootenay Central Railway in operation the Canadian Pacific will have alternative routes from the main line, which should at once make much more economical the handling of trains to the Pacific Coast. The Kettle Valley line in Southern British Columbia, which links up with railways in the United States, and with the Canadian Pacific, which has running rights over it, will make an admirable alternative route by way of the Crow's Nest Pass, as its grades nowhere exceed 2 per cent., while the Kootenay Central has an average grade of less than 1 per cent. The Kettle Valley line will also be of great value to the fruit growers of the Okanagan Valley, as it touches Penticton and Summerland, and puts them into direct touch with the mining districts of Southern British Columbia. As a scenic route the line should prove attractive to tourists, as the southern end of the Okanagan Valley is by far the most picturesque portion of this favored section of British Columbia. By early summer the full passenger service will be in operation, and Mr. Warren expects that a large volume of the transcontinental travel will be diverted to his line.

Once a ferryman was asked by a timid lady in his boat whether any persons were ever lost in that river. "Oh, no," said he. "We always finds 'em again the next day."

TOWN IS SAVED BY RABBI.

Promised German General That People Would Be Good.

Rabbi Salomon Bamberger, of Luenhalm, a small town near the frontier of Alsace, says the Hebrew Standard, has been instrumental in saving the town from destruction by the Germans. Some of the inhabitants having been found guilty of espionage in the interests of France, the German general imagining that there were several more traitors, threatened to burn the town.

The inhabitants became so terror stricken that Rabbi Bamberger decided to make a personal appeal to the general to spare the town. Attired in his canonicals and wearing his Tallis and Tephillin, the octogenarian rabbi proceeded to the general's quarters and offered himself as a hostage for the loyalty of the population. He reminded the general of God's promise to Abraham that Sodom would be spared if ten righteous men could be found. The general was so touched by the rabbi's earnestness that he decided to abandon his cruel intention, at the same time refusing to accept the rabbi's offer to be hostage for the townspeople's good conduct.

When a Woman Suffers With Chronic Backache

There is Trouble Ahead.

Constantly on their feet, attending to the wants of a large and exacting family, women often break down with nervous exhaustion.

In the stores, factories, and on a farm are weak, ailing women, dragged down with the torturing backache and bearing down pains.

Such suffering isn't natural, but it's dangerous, because due to diseased kidneys.

The dizziness, insomnia, deranged menses and other symptoms of kidney complaint can't cure themselves, they require the assistance of Dr. Hamilton's Pills which go direct to the seat of the trouble.

To give vitality and power to the kidneys, to lend aid to the bladder and liver, to free the blood of poisons, probably there is no remedy so successful as Dr. Hamilton's Pills. For all womanly irregularities their merit is well known.

Because of there mild, soothing, and healing effect, Dr. Hamilton's Pills are safe, and are recommended for girls and women of all ages. 25 cents per box at all dealers. Refuse any substitute for Dr. Hamilton's Pills of Mandrake and butternut.

CANTIRE

The old month of January has a lot of admirers in 1915.

Mr Jim McArthur of Lovat is drawing fence posts from somewhere back in Sullivan Tp. We are not certain if the sweetest girl Jim knows resides near Lovat, but as he shouted on the lines to urge his weary steeds along we fancied he was singing "It's a long long way to Tipperary." It just strikes us that as the supply of cedar is exhausted in the west half of Elderslie and perhaps a large part of Bruce Tp., why could the farmers not co-operate and have a car load shipped to Paisley? It perhaps would not be much dearer and convenience would be quite an item.

Mr Alex Gowanlock has leased the Gross farm on the seventh con. As this farm lies directly behind his own Mr Gowanlock is lucky in securing the property.

According to the annual report of the Dominion Fire Insurance Co the burning of Miss Taylor's house was the work of incendiarism. We do not know exactly on what grounds the company makes the statement but we do know it coincides with public opinion in this locality. Who was the perpetrator of the crime? Is a question yet to be solved. Pitiable as is the plight of the unfortunate victim of that blaze, surely even more so is the case of the miscreant who applied the torch Hiding only behind the shadow of darkness on that fateful night he must carry through life the burden of a reproachful conscience. Like Surajah Dowlah, of Indian Mutiny fame, he will be dreading everyone who approaches him, and dreading to be left alone, he will pass many gloomy days that otherwise might have been bright. Let us hope that haunting memory may lead him to repent of his foul deed, lest he come at last to that place of fire where the walls will not fall in as quickly as did the walls of Mary Taylor's house.

Miss Isabel Cameron has been visiting her relatives in Huron.

We are pleased to learn that Mrs Robt Brown who was very ill is recovering nicely.

BELL ART PIANOS

Are selected by musicians because they know the Bell to be the one piano from which they can get results.

The Bell Illimitable repeating action makes the touch lighter—the response is quicker—it is easier to play on. It is easier for the musician it will be easier for the student—therefore the Bell is the best to buy.

The Bell is made by the largest makers under the British flag. Be patriotic and buy the Bell!

We also handle Organs, Sewing Machines, Edison Phonographs and Records.

WALKERTON

Public School Inspector McCool, who is studying for the degree of Doctor of Pedagogy, has successfully passed in the three subjects that he wrote on in Toronto, and his name appears in the daily papers of Saturday last, as having taken an exceptionally high standing in all of the three subjects. As he expects to write on the fourth and last subject next year, the chances are that he will then be able to put the prefix Doctor in front of his name.

In the action brought by McGregor & Pritchard to compel their neighbor N P Schmidt to trim the branches off his fruit trees that hung over their fence, Judge Klein last week allowed plaintiffs one dollar for the damage caused by the limbs shading their land and obstructing their lane; and also gave orders compelling Schmidt to trim the branches so that they wouldn't overhang plaintiffs' fence in future. Mr Schmidt was also saddled with the entire costs of the action, which it is said will amount to about $150.00.

Among the 61 men who left Walkerton last week to join the 30th Battalion at Guelph was Bugler W Blackmun, who left his wife and family at Wiarton and came to Walkerton to enlist. He is six feet three inches in his socks and straight as a saping—the last of seven brothers to join the British army since the war broke out. Five of them are in the Royal Sussex Regiment, and one with the Scottish Guards. His father is serving in the fortifications of Southern England. Another of the men had seen seven years' service under the British flag, and the way he marched and handled his rifle here was an inspiration to every observer.

The new pipes attached to the kitchen stove at Mr M C Dippel's home having become frozen on Friday morning last, a brisk fire was kindled in the range with a view to thawing them, when of a sudden an explosion occurred which blew the stove to atoms and scattered furniture about the room like loose chairs in a railway wreck. Mrs Dippel, who was in the kitchen at the time, was slightly burned, and had a narrow escape from serious injury. A new stove and a hurry up call to the plumber were necessitated by the mishap.

A joint meeting of the town council and the Walkerton board of trade was held here on Monday night with the object of taking steps to secure some of the war orders that are being awarded in this country. The fact that Chesley has just secured a $100,000 order for shrapnel for the British army and which will keep about 50 men working night and day in the defunct bed-stead factory that has been idle for many months, spurred the locals on to an endeavor to get the wheels rolling in the saddlery factory or the binder twine works and thus give employment to the idle here at a time when the shadow of the wolf is hovering over many a home. Messrs Robertson and Rowland offered electric power free as an incentive to any such industry to start up and run during the war, while Messrs R Truax & Son also volunteered the necessary power to turn the twine factory during the war if any orders could be secured for it. As a result a committee composed of Senator Donnelly, and Messrs R B Truax, M.P., W D Cargill, M.P.P., Wm Shaw and G S Schmidt was appointed to go to Montreal and interview the Government purchasing agents of Britain, France and Russia, with a view to discovering what they need and learning the kind of machinery necessary to turn out their supplies.—Herald-Times.

WILLISCROFT

Mrs Wm Jamieson and Miss Allie left last Friday for their home at Melfort, Sask, after spending a couple of months visiting the former's mother, Mrs S Pecock and other members of the family.

Quite a number of the young people took in the carnival in Paisley rink last Friday night. The most of them donned masks for the occasion.

Miss Lizzie Robb returned home from Brantford on a visit to her mother.

Mr Norman McKay, of Walkerton District Representative of Agriculture addressed the members of the Farmers' Club here last Thursday night on "Crop Rotation." On Feb 25th a debate will be held at the Club meeting.

Keep Feb 26th posted in your cap and make arrangements to come to the I. O. F. oyster supper on that date. Big time as usual.

A few of the Orangemen from around here attended the county meeting in Port Elgin on Tuesday.

Mr A Rushton is feeling so blue he doesn't know what to do.

CARGILL

Rev and Mrs W J Fiddes entertained the young people of the Purdy and Cargill Methodist church, on Wednesday evening Feb 3rd. A very pleasant evening was spent.

Miss Mabel Storie of London is visiting her uncle Mr H N Brownscombe.

Miss Cora Purdy of Glamis spent a few days at the parsonage last week.

Mr Phil Sparling who was visiting at his home here returned to London last Thursday.

—THE ADVOCATE office has a splendid stock of wedding stationery and calling cards on hand, also the most beautiful styles of type, so we are able to turn out the finest lines of wedding invitations, announcements, cards, etc. We can do work fit to invite the best of people to a wedding, so why pay two or three times as much to city printers or engravers for something that isn't a whit better for the purpose? PINKERTON

Mr Jack Donnelly took a load of the young people to Mr J Fleming's on Thursday where a most enjoyable evening was spent in dancing.

Quite a number from the village attended the I.O.O.F. at bowls in Glamis on Friday evening. All report a good time.

Mr Cecil Garland was on the sick list last week but is able to be around again.

Miss Margaret Calwell Sundayed at her home in Kincardine township.

A large number of relatives and friends attended the reception on Tuesday evening given by Mr and Mrs Samuel Reid in honor of the marriage of their daughter Eleanor Rogers to Mr John Clarence McTeer. After the reception dancing was enjoyed by the young people till an early hour. The many beautiful presents testify to the high esteem in which bride and groom are held.

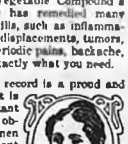
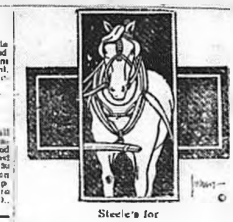
WOMAN IN TERRIBLE STATE



Finds Help in Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.



Cape Wolfe, Canada.—"Last March I was a complete wreck. I had given up all hope of getting better or living any length of time, as I was such a sufferer from female troubles. But I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and today I am in good health and have a pair of twin boys two months old and growing finely. I surprised doctors and neighbors for they all know what a wreck I was.

"Now I am healthy, happy and hearty, and owe it all to Lydia E. Pinkham's remedies. You may publish this letter if you like. I think if more women used your remedies they would have better health."—Mrs J. T. Cook, Lot No. 7, Cape Wolfe, P.E.I., Canada.

Because your case is a difficult one, and doctors having done you no good, do not continue to suffer without giving Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a trial. It surely has remedied many cases of female ills, such as inflammation, ulceration, displacements, tumors, irregularities, periodic pains, backache, and it may be exactly what you need.

The Pinkham record is a proud and peerless one. It is a record of constant victory over the obstinate ills of women—ills that deal out despair. It is an established fact that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has restored health to thousands of such suffering women. Why don't you try it if you need such a medicine?

—Mr. John Trelford went to Toronto on Monday to attend the funeral of a niece, Miss Daily Dean.

—Pte. Alex Blue and Charlie Graham of the Second Contingent were up from London Camp over Sunday.

—Mrs Roberts, east of the town, is suffering from a broken arm. The fracture was sustained by falling on ice.

—Mr. Jas. McKerracher, of the Merchants Bank staff, Montreal, is spending a couple of weeks' vacation at his home in town.

—Mr and Mrs Mac MacMillan, of Elora road north, have the sympathy of all in the loss of their baby daughter, at just a week old. Pneumonia was the cause of death.

—Knox Church tea-meeting on Friday evening will be a revival of the old-fashioned annual event, but which has been passed over by this congregation for a decade or more. The ladies are sparing no pains to make it a pleasant social event for members and friends and all others who may attend.

—Walkerton Telescope: Mr P C Ryan of Paisley, who is district deputy of the No 5 District A. F. & A. M., paid his official visit here Tuesday evening. Evidently Mr Ryan is the right man in the right place, as he gave a most excellent address at the close of the work, which all the brethern very much enjoyed.

—Mr. Fred Foster has bought a confectionery and ice cream business in Clifford and will take possession on Feb. 25th. Mr. and Mrs. Foster will be followed to their new home with best wishes for their success. We lose in Fred one of our best vocalists, who very willingly gave his assistance on entertainment programmes.

—Wilfred McGill, a Paisley boy who is attending Galt Collegiate Institute, is a new star on the Junior Northern League team of that town. The Reporter speaks highly of this "big lad's" work in his first game against Seaforth, in which he scored 7 goals. The paper says Wilfred certainly knows how to play centre ice, and especially in front of the opponents' nets.

—Mr Angus McPhee, Elora road north, has received word of the death of his brother-in-law, Dugald Campbell, which occurred in Chicago on Jan 30th. The deceased and his family lived in Paisley and vicinity for many years, removing about twenty years ago to Zion City, Ill., He was 69 years of age, and is survived by Mrs Campbell and a family of three sons and two daughters.

—Mr. H. P. Murphy, a prominent sawmill owner at Tobermory, accidentally shot himself while hunting on Wednesday of last week, and died at his home that night. He had shot a rabbit and in stooping to pick it up discharged his gun, the charge entering his arm near the shoulder. Alone he walked nearly two miles before assistance was secured, and on reaching his home was so weak from loss of blood that he expired shortly after. His wife and two children survive.

—Major Thos Hay, of Paisley, is now commanding officer of the 32nd Regt., he having been given charge of the equipment at headquarters in Walkerton and installed in office a few days ago. Major Hay has been connected with the regiment for many years, and has stepped up from private in the ranks to the colonelcy, which he now occupies, and is therefore one of the most experienced men who have been at the head of the regiment. He has volunteered for active service in the present war, and is ready to go at any time he is called.

—Shoes and Rubbers for 25c and 50c Come in to see if they fit. Ballachey, Laidlaw & Co.

Recently we heard a citizen state that he had witnessed a gathering of thirteen dogs at a street intersection in town. Canine population seems to have been at high-water mark this winter, but as the assessor will soon be on his annual rounds a fair proportion of the dog army may be reported among the dead and missing, and therefore untaxable. Three real fatalities occurred last week, however. On Friday two were killed on the railway bridge over the Teeswater. These were hounds belonging to Messrs. W. J. Hills and Jas. A. McNeill. The animals were crossing the bridge, and were struck by the freight train. Mr. H. Irwin brought a nice coach dog home with him from Walkerton, and tied it in the stable. A short time after spotty was found dead at the end of the rope, having jumped out of the manger and the rope was too short to allow him to reach the floor.

—The annual meeting of Centre Bruce County L.O.L. was held in Port Elgin on Feb. 9th, and it was one of the most successful meetings ever held. About fifty delegates were present representing Walkerton, Cargill, Paisley, Port Elgin, Southampton, Williscroft and Underwood. The report showed a very successful year. County Chaplain Rev. Mr. Hamilton, of Southampton, delivered a very patriotic and instructive address, and the bilingual school question was ably dealt with by the Deputy Master, C. H. Green, and District Master Rushton of Saugeen district gave a very able review of the work done in the northern part of the county. It was decided to hold the next annual meeting in Paisley and to celebrate the coming 12th of July at Southampton. The election of officers resulted as follows: County Master, W. S. Mitchell, Paisley; Deputy Co. Master, C. H. Green, Southampton; Chaplain, Rev. Mr. Hamilton, Southampton; Rec. Sec'y, Geo. B. Smith, Underwood; Fin. Sec'y, Mr. Robinson, Port Elgin; Treas., W. C. McFaddeo, Port Elgin; D. of C., W. J. McNeelly, Walkerton; Lecturers, Messrs. White and Collard. The County Master was appointed to represent the county lodge at the grand lodge of Ontario West at North Bay, March 10th.

—Another fine of $25 and costs was paid into the town treasury by a rural visitor who was convicted of being drunk in this local option town.

—Miss Jean Miller met with a runaway accident on Tuesday evening by which she is left in a badly shaken condition. As she was driving down street the heldback on the harness became loose, allowing the cutter to run up to the horse's heels. The steed became frightened and dashed away at top speed. At the corner of Rowe St. it turned for Purdy's livery stable, where it belongs, and the cutter was overturned, horse and cutter striking against the Royal Bank building. Miss Miller was thrown out free of the rig, striking the road heavily, and rolling over and over for some distance. Her worst injuries are a sprained ankle and disfigured face.

The Darkest Hour;

Or, The Hope That Still Lived.

CHAPTER IX. (Continued).

In the cashier's box, during this time, Miss Jeffery had been making little calculations on little slips of paper. Before her Mr Jeffery's speech lay significant. It spoke Mrs. Jones, Miss Lloyd, and Miss Merriman knew by experience what this event had portended. They knew that Mr. Jeffery was coming four rows of seats each five seats banked by the aisle of the assistant 15 when his master entered were to be debited. The proprietress, after long to debit the total amount to the cattle fund from the monthly income of over wages, which would fall due on the Monday morning. Miss Jones, Miss Lloyd, and Miss Merriman would have to wait Monday that time a week; it was only Maggie who was to be paid to-night. But all the girls knew that the 2 pounds were in the form of sovereigns and each of the three more expectant ones was clasping her breath that the deduction which fines would make from the slender sum total of her monthly remuneration might be as small as possible.

But the inexperienced Maggie did not share their secret anxiety. Her work-driven brain, in spite of the bodily fatigue which she must needs suffer, was engaged in its own scheme, she was up in the dormitory now, trying up the parcel of her clothes which she had made for the night. She were not kept waiting for her money, she would be out at shop-only enough to-night to get an omnibus that would take her a good part of the way into the heart of the great, and perhaps all the western side. She ought not, perhaps, to waste even so much as twopence in this manner now that pence were so few, and had to be earned so hardly; every extravagant halfpenny, too, meant a little more fire in the garret which she called home, or a little more nourishing food for the sick little girl who lay in pain there. But to-night, when she was going to leave sixteen whole shillings in her mother's, it would surely be the truest economy to get home as soon as she could. The money would make her a messenger of relief and comfort. The sooner she arrived, the sooner would her dear ones be made happier. She resolved to indulge in the extravagance of a seat in the omnibus, and went downstairs almost light-heartedly, saying to herself again and again that she hoped that she would not have to wait long before starting on the longed-for homeward journey, which had been it her thoughts all day, beckoning and encouraging her like a star; there was shining before her, so that her feet might not fail.

She had not long to wait, in very truth, for Mr. Jeffery called her to him at the moment of her re-entering the shop. He was standing in front of the pay desk, and he held some money out to her. The left hand of it was thin and white, and it was work thankfully, and there stood still, waiting for that.

"What are you waiting for?" her employer inquired sharply. The others were gone, and the sooner you follow them the better. I want to put out the gas. Well, what do you want? What do you mean by staring at me like that for?"

"If you please, sir, you spoke," she faltered out, and held out the hand that held the three shillings lying in it. "It was please, sir, I—"

She was too confused and too shy to get out the words she wanted to say. She could only stand, humble and flushed and trembling, before the man, whom she supposed to be her own and her mother's and Alice's sole stay and hope in all this cruel and strange labyrinth of London.

"Well?" he said, now impatiently, with anger gathering on his heavy face, as was clear that he did not intend to help her out of her difficulty in speaking. Maggie wondered desperately why the three shillings which she still held out to him did not tell their tale without need of explanatory words from her.

"Don't you want the money to-night, after all? he inquired more sharply. "Because, if not, why did you bother me about it? You girls seem to be all fools. You don't even know your own minds."

"It isn't that, sir," Maggie answered, scarcely able to hear her own voice above the wild beating of her heart as she realized that she must speak now, or else go home utterly empty-handed. "It isn't that at all. But I should like my last month's money to-night if you could let me have it, sir. Of course, three shillings is better than nothing; but my little sister is ill, and so I—"

"You want last month's money," interrupted Mr. Jeffery sternly. "What more do you want?"

"Three shillings, sir." The girl looked dazed, and her flush died away in a pale-ness that had in it a touch of fear, as if of a sudden, vague alarm. "Three shillings?" At ten pounds a year my months money ought to be sixteen and eightpence really, but, of course, the eightpence will be taken up by the deduction of a penny of two for paying me to-night instead of Monday and by that fine you said would be charged to me for leaving the photograph about. But there's still the sixteen shillings, isn't there, sir? And it's only three you've given me."

The shopkeeper laughed a contemptuous laugh which somehow sent a shudder through her trembling, little body.

"Sixteen shillings, eh?" he said with amusement. "So that's what you're waiting for, is it? Well, my girl, I'm afraid you've got to learn you've what it means to be disappointed. Sixteen shillings and eightpence is certainly the amount which would have come to you to-day if you had behaved yourself all through the month and done nothing to forfeit it. But unfortunately for you, you haven't been sensible enough and obedient enough to do that. You've broken its rules right and left, and let yourself in for so many fines that the sum total of them has naturally brought your month's instalment of salary down a good deal. This year is your fault. You've nobody to blame but yourself."

But it was sixteen shillings—sixteen shillings, the miserable, dimly-understanding girl repeated in an odd, stunned tone to herself. It was clear that she hardly knew what she said. She stood with desperate, pitiful eyes pitied to Mr. Jeffery's relentless countenance. "It was sixteen shillings, and now only three—only three!"

"Come, come, I'll read you down some of the fines on your bill, and then, perhaps, you'll understand and clear out, instead of keeping me here, with the gas burning to waste." He stepped back into the cashier's box and in it he sat down again with the notebook that had been lying open on the desk. He shouted Maggie a long column of figures extending over three pages of it. "Thats your lot. Now read out a few of the items."

"For taking two pieces of paper and one piece of string out of the shop without permission, contrary to rules, three shillings.

"There," commented Mr. Jeffery, with increasing severity of tone, "that was downright dishonesty! If I find you doing such a second time, I will call in the police and you will be punished accordingly.

A cry of surprise, mingled with a half stifled sob, broke from the trembling girl's throat.

It was only a little piece of brown paper and about a yard and a half of string that I took away, sir, she pleaded in self-defence. "I never dreamt that anybody could look on that as thieving. And I didn't know there was a rule—"

"Ignorance of the law is no excuse," returned her employer, shaking his head. "Didn't I tell you you had to copy the rules out for yourself and take them home and learn them by heart? You could do this very well on Sunday, and you'd much better way of spending the day than lazing about, as I daresay you do. Well, now, read across the next three-two shillings for being late after the time allowed for dinner—it was three, there's a lot of laziness in you whenever there's nobody to-stir you up, and here are some more—sixpence for unnecessary talking in the room; sixpence for striking matches carelessly about the premises; sixpence for defacing wall with nails; threepence for keeping customer waiting; threepence for leaving piece of buttered bread on the plate at teatime; threepence for carrying slice of bread up to dormitory. All food must be eaten at the proper times. Now—"

He paused to scrutinize her white face in order to assure himself that she had become keenly alive to the degradation which she had committed and the shortcomings in particular which he had found it necessary to rebuke her. He saw her lips quiver, but he thought at the same time that she looked stubborn, and consequently his voice hardened still more as he proceeded with the miserable catalogue of the sins of the omission of whose sons for which she was now financially suffering.

"Now there comes a little item of a shilling for disorderly conduct in the shop. You have been too intelligent to forget that your hours behind the counter are your business hours, and belong to me, and that consequently any moments spent in laughing and chattering with your fellow shop-girls are moments robbed from me. This evening I saw you talking with Miss Jones. It doesn't make any difference that there were no customers in the shop at the time. Business hours are business hours. You'd better bear this in mind. You want straightening up a bit. You don't seem to have any idea of punctuality, and the assistant has got to be brisk and smart. You've moved around during the past week or two as if you thought they were doing the floor a favor by walking about on it. Now, do you want any more of the odds and ends on this list? There's one for a shilling for eating in the shop. You were munching a crust, or something, and—"

Another sob interrupted him.

"It was only a bit of the bread I'd had on my plate for breakfast, sir, she protested in eager, desperate self-defence—hadn't time to eat it before I came upstairs, and so I brought it up in my pocket, as I was hungry. I didn't know I was doing any harm. I never meant to do any harm about the other things, either. The only that I haven't had time enough yet to learn what you want and do it. And oh, sir, if you'd only let me off a few of the fines—just a few of the fines. I'll promise you to try hard to do better next month. You see, I thought what I was doing, and—"

"Exactly so," said Mr. Jeffery in his turn. "That's where fines do such a lot of good. If it weren't for em, some of you young women ever would think of anything except your own simpering face and bits of ribbon and nonsense of that kind. In your case, Miss Maitland, I am sorry, of course, that the fines should have totalled up to so large an amount. But, as I said just now, it is entirely your own fault, and I cannot show you any leniency that I haven't shown to the others. And I must say that it doesn't greatly please me that you should only be sorry for having discovered the rules you find that your disobedience is costing you some of your money. The above a very bad spirit; a very bad spirit indeed. Now you must go at once. It is time for the shop to be closed for the night. You had better take your three shillings and be thankful. In any case, apart from fines, you would not receive the full sixteen shillings and eightpence a month, because a shilling has to be deducted as a contribution to my medical fund—this is to pay a doctor so much a year for attending to my assistants in the event of illness—and a shilling as a monthly subscription to the house library. Finally, there is a tuppence charged monthly for bookkeeping. So that, allowing for the deduction of half-a-crown, the salary per month which will actually be put in your hands will amount to fourteen shillings and twopence."

He had been practically pushing the girl out of the shop as he spoke, and his last words were followed by the slamming of the outer door behind her. She found herself alone with her utter despair, misery, and grief, out in the inclement night of snow and icy east wind, with her three shillings held tight in her close shut palm, and with the idea of going home gone utterly out of her mind. The omnibus which earlier in the evening she had planned so calm, pleasantly rushing along the road ahead by the pavement whereon she stood; but in her half-dazed despair she let it go by unstopped and almost unnoticed.

Despair? yes it was something very like despair which had swept over on the evening of her terrible disappointment. How could she go home with only three shillings instead of the sixteen which she was expected to bring. What were old Mrs Maitland and the little girl to do in the four or five weeks which would loose to elapse before any more money came into the poor lonely tenement? The present was black enough; the prospect with its fines graded for failure enough. But the future threatened to be even worse; and the more so by reason of the fact of a hideous suggestion having been roused in her imagination that, try as she might, work as hard as she might, day by day after day as she might, there yet would always be a column of deductions for fines and implied fines, which would reduce her monthly instalment of salary, or wages, whichever people might choose to call it, to less than a sum in comparison with what it ought to have been that to result on it any longer as a mere pittance of support for her adoptive mother and sister would be both futile and foolish.

All this was not quite clear to her yet; it was only beginning to dawn dark upon her heavy unhappy little soul. In the meantime the home must still be thought of. Night she not after all to go there at once? Yes, she must take the three shillings there straightway than to keep the watching old mother racked with anxiety over the sister's pain—as no forthcoming!

Ah, yes, it would be better to have to knowledge that she herself, the trusted breadwinner, had by her awkwardness and general want of business capacity brought upon their heads this bitterest of all possible disappointments. The fault was not, after all, but theirs, as well as herself, would have to suffer for it. How could she go and confess to them here and now that she had been, and would then not have every reason to reproach and reproach herself bitterly when she should have to acknowledge that her fellow-workers, Miss Jones, Miss Lloyd, and Miss Merriman, had always considered the same home a proposition worth mentioning of their legitimate earnings? She herself must be a very stupid, helpless, incompetent girl to make mistakes enough to bring upon her all that had fallen to poor little Alice, would have to bear the hard-est brunt of the consequences of her unspeakable folly.

She sat down on a doorstep in the lee of cold, and began to cry like a child.

An hour passed, and the end of it found her still there. The end of a second hour might have found no difference had it not been for the passing of a policeman, who stopped and asked her what she was doing there. The girl got up then and pulled herself, in a dazed way, to face the world again.

She sped away from the questioning policeman, and went in the direction of the heart of the Metropolis. She had made up her mind what she would do, she knew not going home as more with the three shillings still safely in her cold palm. She was going first to three time Hare, her former mistress, to appeal for the help which she had been so foolish in unwilling to ask for before.

How happy she had been in those days when she was Christine Darne—seeing much! How much better it had been to live then in her quiet, comfortable, and humble work than it was to live now, toiling almost without rest for about bread and even contracted hate to struggle and failing to get the bread!

She knew that Christine Darne was now that is, unless she and the young grenadier had either quarrelled or become more than ever united, and that she would be at one of the two theatres. So she set her weary, trembling lips, and made her difficult way further towards the north of London—as fast as her tired feet would bear her. Presently she might have to spend some coppers out of the three shillings on some method of conveyance if such were to be had. However, the poor feet could never carry her so far unaided.

She did not dream as she went that the night was a fateful one for the girl whose help she was seeking.

CHAPTER X.

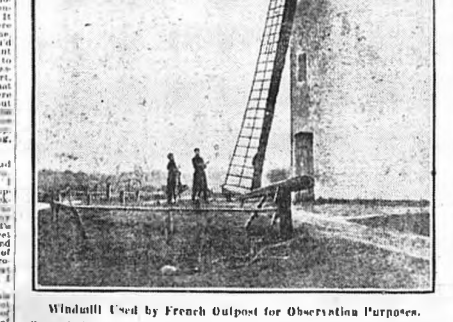
Yes; this was indeed to be a momentous night for Christine Dare and Brian Hardy. But Maggie Maitland, tramping to Notre Newington in the eagerness of her great need, could not foresee this. She could not have guessed that each would do the same, even had she been less desolate at heart, and thereby able to think of what might be happening to others outside her own unhappy little family.

She never knew quite clearly afterwards how she got across London to the neighborhood of Stoke Newington on that bitter night of snow and icy east wind. Walk all the way she did not. Weakened as she had lately been by under-feeding and over fretting, she could not have forced her feet to have taken her so far even if she had tried. The necessity for continual battling with the merciless wind would in itself have been tiring enough for the strongest of men or women. The desolate look of the almost empty streets was also overcoming its effect on Maggie was dead that once and once again during that long night tramp she and her brother's death would be far less hard than continued life was to her now. Long before half of her journey had been gone through she was exhausted, every step had become painful to her. Would she ever reach that distant suburb where help awaited her? and would Christine Dare and Brian Hardy prove only be there?

She felt—and a second great disappointment on this unhappy night would break down her strength and her hope for ever—she walked as long as she could, asking her way of the very few persons whom she met. The snow was still falling in whirls, driven by the fierce wind; she felt the lungs cold to the bone through her thread-bare jacket; and the very marrow of her bones seemed to herself that it was a wonder that so much snow can find the cold which was in trouble than when even heart was light and happy. In her despair she almost was afraid that the cold might kill her before she reached the end of her journey.

As the next she realized in her mind her experiences during the past month in the shop, and the conduct of officers which Mr. Jeffery had so exasperatingly read out to her a little while ago. What an overwhelming list it had been, setting up, as it had done, not only her month's money, but also all except three shillings of the amounts which she had earned as remuneration by successfully selling certain goods which had been entrusted to her hand.

She had of late striven her very utmost to do her work so well that her employer might be seen than satisfied with her. She had used all the powers of observation which Mr. Jeffery had so exasperatingly read out to her a little while ago. What an overwhelming list it had been, setting up, as it had done, not only her month's money, but also all except three shillings of the amounts which she had earned as remuneration by successfully selling certain goods which had been entrusted to her hand.



She had of late striven her very utmost to do her work so well that her employer might be seen than satisfied with her. She had used all the powers of observation which she possessed to induce customers to buy more than they had come in for. She had done nothing to encourage Mr. Jeffery's interests except tell the lies that she had thought her to tell. The simple faith which had been taught her from her earliest years had not allowed her to allow him on the matter of the cheapness of some evidently poor cashmere would add for a better quality of velvet than any which the shop had in stock. She had protested of the assurance that they should be a little disappointed in the wear of the first article again, describing it as a better quality goods and fixing a correspondingly higher price upon it. Miss Jones, Lloyd, and Merriman, practised this game daily, coming no home to it, and having even taught Maggie to do it, the simple little Maggie, astonished and grieved regarded it as nothing less than a dishonest practice, and shrank from it with a quiet persistence which had several times angered both Mr. and Mrs. Jeffery that the unconscious offender had several times narrowly escaped instant dismissal.

When a fellow is always on the fence, he ought to be pretty well hammered.

"Here, my son," said the father to Willie, "what does this mean? Your report gives you only fifty for arithmetic, and your teacher makes the comment that you can't count up to twenty-five. What are you going to do with such a record when you go into business?" "Now don't worry, father," replied the son. "To count up to twenty-five isn't necessary for success in business nowadays." "Not necessary!" gasped the father. "No, sir. I can start a ten-cent store."

Windmill Used by French Outpost for Observation Purposes.

One of the most arduous duties which falls to the lot of the soldiers is perhaps that of outpost work, the special functions of which are to gather information concerning the enemy's movements. In order to obtain this information nearly every device is tried; one such method is shown above. Under certain circumstances a windmill offers a good point of vantage for an observer to take up on the axle, limiting his body up against the arm of the sail. Concerning the general duties of outposts, the following quotation from an officer's letter was published recently in The Times: "I went on about 300 yards in front of my scouts. It was a pretty jumpy job. The enemy's trenches were about 950 yards from ours. I paced about 150 yards and then got down on my hands and knees and crept on for some way, expecting every moment to run into the German trenches. It was pretty black, and I could only see a few yards in front of me. I had a loaded revolver and map with me. Every now and then I came across a dead German. Well, I couldn't think why I hadn't struck the trenches, so I went off on my left a bit. The stars had gone in and I was pretty well lost in the middle of this big plateau."

FLEET OF GOLD AND SILVER.

King George Has Miniatures of Every Vessel in the Navy.

By the Admiralty's instructions perfect models are made in paraffin wax of every new battleship before it is laid down, and these models are tested in a tank specially erected for the purpose.

The models are from 12 feet to 24 feet long, and the tank is 100 feet long and 20 feet wide.

The models are made of wax because it is a material which does not absorb water or change its weight, and so that alterations can be easily made

Fleets, not of wax, but of silver and gold are kept by our King and also by the Kaiser.

The Kaiser's collection consists of model vessels made of solid silver, illustrating the development of sailing ships from the far-away days of the Vikings down to our own time.

King George has a miniature fleet in gold and silver, which shows the progress of the British Navy since the days of William the Conqueror, every model being perfect to the minutest detail.

Many of these tiny vessels date from the fourteenth to the seventeenth century, when it was the custom of maritime towns to present them to royalties who honored them with a visit.

$25.00 FOR A LETTER

CAN YOU WRITE ONE?

Thirteen Prizes to be Awarded in a Letter Writing Competition

Some years ago the Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., of Brockville, Ont., offered a series of prizes to residents of the Province of Ontario for the best letters describing cures wrought by the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. Hundreds of letters were submitted in this competition and yet there must have been thousands of other users of the pills who did not avail themselves of the opportunity to win a prize. To all these another letter-writing competition is offered. Thousands of cures through the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills have never been reported. These will furnish the material for the letters to be written in this contest. There is no demand upon the imagination; every letter must deal with facts and facts only.

The Prizes.

The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., of Brockville, Ont., will award a prize of $25.00 for the best letter received on or before the 1st day of March, 1915, from residents of Ontario, on the subject, "Why I Recommend Dr. Williams' Pink Pills." A prize of $10.00 will be awarded for the second best letter received; a prize of $5.00 for the third best letter, and ten prizes of $2.00 each for the next best ten letters.

The Conditions.

The cure or benefit from the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills described in the letter may be in the writer's own case, or one that has come under his or her personal observation.

More than one cure may be described in the letter, but every statement must be literally and absolutely true.

Every letter must be signed by the full name and correct address of the person sending it. If it describes the cure of some person other than the writer of the letter, it must also be signed by the person whose cure is described as a guarantee of the truth of the statements made.

The writer of each letter must state the name and date of the paper in which he or she saw this announcement.

Fine writing will not win the prize unless you have a good case to describe. The strength of the recommendation and not the style of the letter will be the basis of the award.

It is understood that The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co. shall have the right to publish any letter entered in this contest if they desire to do so whether it wins a prize or not.

The contest will close on March 1st, 1915, and the prizes will be awarded as soon as possible thereafter. Do not delay. If you know of a cure write your letter NOW. Observe the above conditions carefully or your letter may be thrown out.

Address all letters as follows:

GERMANY IS BEATEN.

Military Peer Believes Kaiser's Forces Are Becoming Weaker.

Lord Sydenham, who is a noted authority on military subjects, contributes to the London Times an article reviewing the situation at the end of six months of war.

"No reasonable grounds for any reversal of the verdict of the past six months," he says, "can be suggested. Relatively to the allies the Germans must grow steadily weaker in men and material. Every plan of their strategists has come to naught. The surprise which the Germans held in store has not materialized and their vaunted Zeppelins are beginning to be regarded as failures.

"The inspired propaganda to which we have grown accustomed is peculiarly significant of the confidence in German arms and German valor having left. Victories have to be invented for popular consumption, and frantic efforts are being made to break the solidarity of the entente and to enlist the United States as champions of everything that they were created to prevent.

"The ruthless barbarity shown to non-combatants, the deliberate violation of all international conventions, framed to promote humanity in war; the mendacious reports spread by all available agencies; the violent diatribes directed against Great Britain—even the high honor preferred upon the obscure author of the 'Hymn of Hate'—combine to tell their tale to any student of psychology.

"When the leaders of a great nation resort to methods of this kind it is a sure indication that they believe their cause to be lost. Neither nations nor individuals vilify opponents whom they feel able to overcome. Germany, though still unconquered, is beaten. And if the allies remain steadfast, sparing no effort and grudging no sacrifice, the forces already at work will complete what the Germans' lack of success on land and sea has begun."

CAPT. WILMOT S. NICHOLSON.

Naval Hero Always Lands in the Thick of Things.

In the battle in the North Sea the cruiser "Aurora," the first of those exceedingly fast vessels which have been completed and which are termed "destroyers of destroyers," was in action with the German cruiser Kolberg, and left her in a sinking condition. The captain of the Aurora is Wilmot S. Nicholson, a Scotchman whose parents, General and Mrs. Nicholson, live at St. Andrews. As commander of the Hogue he was mentioned in despatches for the seamanlike manner in which he took the Arethusa in tow on a pitch dark night after the naval action at Heligoland on August 28th.

It was in that same spirit of rendering aid to a helpless ship that led him to endeavor to rescue the Cressy, when she was torpedoed on September 21st, and when his own cruiser, the Hogue, was also sent to the bottom. Captain Nicholson was one of the fortunate ones on that occasion, and soon afterwards he was made commander of the Aurora.

Capt. Nicholson,

Numerous adventures have been the lot of Captain Nicholson during his 27 years in the navy. He joined in 1887 and two years later was on the Calliope at Samoa, when that vessel alone, by excellent seamanship of her captain, steamed out of the harbor to safety while seven other men-of-war of other nations were driven ashore. Later he was commander of the Prince George when she was rammed in a gale of wind in the Bay of Biscay, and having to do with the interior economy of the ship, he contributed largely to her being saved. In 1909 he gained his captaincy, and for some years held an appointment with the Admiralty.

The high esteem in which he was held was apparent when he was appointed to the Dreadnought as Flag Captain to Admiral Sir Charles Briggs, then commanding the Fourth Battle Squadron. This was his last appointment prior to that on the Hogue.

SENSE ABOUT FOOD.

Facts Worth Knowing.

It is a serious question sometimes to know just what to eat when a person's stomach is out of order and most foods cause trouble.

Grape-Nuts food can be taken at any time with the certainty that it will digest. Actual experience of people is valuable to anyone interested.

A woman writes: "I had suffered with indigestion for about four years, ever since an attack of typhoid fever, and at times could eat nothing but the very lightest food, and then suffer so with my stomach I would wish I never had to eat anything.

"I was urged to try Grape-Nuts, and since using it I do not have to starve myself any more, but I can eat it at any time and feel nourished and satisfied, dyspepsia is a thing of the past, and I am now strong and well.

"My husband also had an experience with Grape-Nuts. He was put under the doctor's care, but medicine did not seem to do him any good until he began to leave off ordinary foods and use Grape-Nuts. It was surprising to see the change in him. He grew better right off, and naturally he has none but words of praise for Grape-Nuts.

"Our boy thinks he cannot eat a meal without Grape-Nuts, and he learns so fast at school that his teacher comments on it. I am satisfied that it is because of the great nourishing elements in Grape-Nuts."

This mother is right. Grape-Nuts food is a certain and remarkable rebuilder of body, nerves and brain.

"There's a Reason."

It All Started From a Bad Cold

WATFORD MAN FOUND RELIEF IN DODD'S KIDNEY PILLS.

Mr. Robt. Taylor, Sr., After Suffering for Two Years, Tells of the Benefits He Got From Dodd's Kidney Pills.

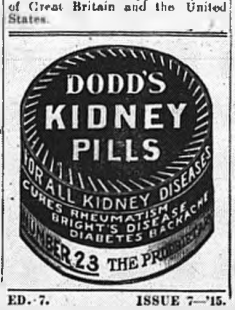
Watford, Ont., Feb. 5th (Special).—Mr. Robert Taylor, Sr., a very estimable man living here, is telling his friends that the pain in his back, from which he suffered for some time, has disappeared, and that he gives all the credit to Dodd's Kidney Pills.

"My trouble started with a cold," Mr. Taylor states, "and though I was treated by a doctor I got no permanent relief. I had cramps in my muscles and stiffness in my joints, my sleep was broken and unrefreshing and I perspired freely with the least exertion. I had attacks of rheumatism and sciatica, and though I tried many medicines I found no relief till I tried Dodd's Kidney Pills. I must say they were a great benefit to me."

Mr. Taylor's troubles came from his kidneys. The diseased kidneys failed to strain the uric acid out of the blood and the results were as he has stated. Dodd's Kidney Pills put the kidneys in working order, the uric acid was strained out of the blood, and the troubles went with it.

COAL FAMINE A WAR DANGER

Diminished Supply May Be Offset by Diminished Demand.



A coal famine in the grip of winter may add its terrors to the situation in continental Europe. The degree of interruption to coal mining in Germany, Austria-Hungary, France and Belgium is not known outside those countries. The interruption to this essential business is no doubt negligible in Great Britain and Russia. Coal mining is very likely prostrate in Belgium, but the production of the coal mines in that country, 23,000,000 tons a year, is not an important factor, especially now that the industrial life in that country has been annihilated.

Coal production in Germany—260,000,000 tons a year—has probably been safeguarded by the systematic and thorough German government despite the need for able-bodied men as soldiers. Austria-Hungary has a normal annual output of 57,000,000 tons, and the indications by many persons are thought to point to the derangement of this supply. The coal production of France is 45,000,000 tons a year, and with the need of that country for every man capable of bearing arms, curtailment of the coal output there may be apprehended. Russia brings to the surface of the earth on the average 22,000,000 tons a year. The great coal digger of Europe is Great Britain, where annually 292,000,000 tons are brought from out of the earth.

The slackening of industry in Europe and consequent slump in the demand for coal for manufacturing, for locomotive driving and ship driving may avert a coal famine and the production may not fall below the demand for domestic or house-warming purposes in the countries at war and those neutral countries which in times of peace have depended for coal on the countries at war.

On the other hand, there may be a stimulation of industry in those neutral countries, and hardship may be experienced in driving the wheels of the factories and mills. Italy is an illustration of this. She produces only 700,000 tons of coal a year and is dependent mainly on importation. Great Britain, because of overtime work in many industries on account of the war and because of the non-interruption of her over-sea trade, is probably burning more coal than in normal times and has less to export.

Coal experts, however, incline to the belief that in Europe the diminished supply will be offset by the diminished demand and that the people of the fighting countries—those who have been left at home—will not suffer from a coal famine. In the neutral countries dependent on the importation of coal—Italy, Greece, Sweden, Denmark and Norway and the countries of South America—there may be a demand for coal which will make a terrible pull on the coal shipping capacity of Great Britain and the United States.

A Nova Scotia Case of Interest to All Women

Halifax Sends Out a Message of Help to Many People.

Halifax, N.S., Dec. 15—When interviewed at her home at 194 Argyle St., Mrs. Haverstock was quite willing to talk of her peculiarly unfortunate case. "I was always 'blue' and depressed, felt weak, languid and utterly unfit for any work. My stomach was so disordered that I had no appetite. What I did eat disagreed. I suffered greatly from dizziness and sick headache and feared a nervous breakdown. Upon my druggist's recommendation I used Dr. Hamilton's Pills.

"I felt better at once. Every day I improved. In six weeks I was a well woman, cured completely after different physicians had failed to help me. It is for this reason that I strongly urge sufferers with stomach or digestive troubles to use Dr. Hamilton's Pills."

Dr. Hamilton's Pills strengthen the stomach, improve digestion, strengthen the nerves and restore debilitated systems to health. By cleansing the blood of long-standing impurities, by bringing the system to a high point of vigor, they effectually chase away weariness, depression and disease. Good for young or old, for men, for women, for children. All dealers sell Dr. Hamilton's Pills of Mandrake and Butternut.

AVIATORS' NARROW ESCAPES.

Flying Against Wind Is An Almost Stationary Mark.

Some of the British military aviators have lately had very narrow escapes owing to the effect of the high winds which have been blowing. It must be remembered that if an aeroplane which does, say, seventy miles an hour in calm air, goes up in a wind which at high altitudes is blowing perhaps at sixty miles per hour, its speed against that wind will only be about ten miles an hour, whereas if it turns and flies with the wind, the windspeed will be added to its own speed, and it will then be doing about 130 miles per hour—just as the speed of a boat on a river is decreased or increased when going against or with the current.

When an aeroplane is flying against the wind, it thus offers an almost stationary mark. The Germans, of course, know this as well as the British do, and therefore apparently hold their fire till they see the machine is flying against the wind, and as a result they are now getting very much closer to their targets than they did during the early part of the war, when the weather was practically calm for weeks at a time.

The consequence is that when British pilots are flying against the wind, and find the shells coming too close, they promptly turn and sail off down wind, and then, of course, their speed is so terrific that it is almost impossible to hit them.

Miss Curley kept a private school and one morning was interviewing a new pupil.

"What does your father do to earn his living?" the teacher asked the little girl.

"Please, ma'am," was the prompt reply, "he doesn't live with us. My mother supports me."

"Well, then," asked the teacher, "how does your mother earn her living?"

"Why," replied the little girl in an artless manner, "she gets paid for staying away from father."

Little Mary's mother was writing a letter to her sister one day, and Mary, who did everything her mother did, was writing also. As she began she looked up and asked: "Mamma, how do you spell 'aunt' —the kind that ain't a bug?"

WOUNDS OF WAR.

Amputations in Present Conflict Comparatively Small.

Dr. Henri de Varigny of Paris says that in the present war the amputations are few in comparison with those of the wars of forty or fifty years ago. Surgeons now have to make no minor amputations. Out of seven thousand wounded men, for example, who were received at the Vichy Hospital in November, only six hundred amputations were made—an average of twenty a day. In the Franco-Prussian War in 1870, the ratio between the number of wounded and the number of amputations was at least forty per cent. The decrease is owing to the fact that the emergency treatment on the field has been so much improved that the danger of infection is almost entirely done away with. According to the Army and Navy Journal, each French soldier now carries his own iodine, and the British soldier will soon be following his example. Every man will have in his kit a small capsule of iodine, in a shape so simple to apply that the wounded man or his neighbor can dress a slight wound instantly. The importance of this immediate dressing can hardly be overestimated, for small wounds, from bullets, shrapnel, or fragments of shell, if not attended to, are quite as likely to become infected as more severe ones.

Painful Swellings Reduced Muscular Strains Ended

Such Troubles Now Quickly Relieved Away by Powerful Remedy.

If you have any muscles that are strained and weak, that are frequently subject to rheumatic pains; if you have any painful swellings that refuse to go away—get busy with Nerviline. This is the very sort of trouble that Nerviline is noted for curing quickly. "I have proved Nerviline simply a wonder in reducing a hard, painful swelling. It followed an injury I received in my left leg and caused me great pain and discomfort. The muscles were strained and sore, and no other remedy gave the ease and comfort I got from rubbing on Nerviline. There is a soothing, pain-relieving power about Nerviline that touched the root of my trouble. Nerviline reduced the swelling, it destroyed the pain, it brought my limb back to perfect condition." The experience of Mr. Bowes, whose home is in Middlesex, is not unusual. Thousands are proving every day that muscular pains of every kind, chronic rheumatism, lumbago, neuralgia and sciatica will yield to Nerviline when nothing else can possibly cure. Nerviline is an old-time family pain remedy, used nearly forty years with great success. The large family size bottle costs 50c., trial size 25c. at all dealers.

Death of William Forrester

William Forrester, a prominent resident of Port Elgin, passed away at his home on Sunday evening, in his 80th year. For more than a year he had been in failing health, and the end was not unexpected.

The late Mr Forrester was born in Sterlingshire, Scotland, in 1835, and when a young man came to Canada, first locating in Vaughn township. About 58 years ago he took up land in Saugeen township, where he lived for many years, retiring some few years ago to live in Port Elgin. William Forrester's life was an active one. Coming to this section so early it was necessary, in order to make a home, to clear the forests and experience many hardships. During his farming operations he found time to devote himself to municipal affairs, and was a councillor and a school trustee. As a staunch Liberal he was always interested in his party's affairs, and as a Presbyterian he was active in the affairs of his church, and gave of his means and talent towards its advancement. In all his undertakings he had the counsel and help of a loving wife, who now survives. There are surviving six sons and three daughters John and Andrew, of Red Deer; Edward, Kincardine; William, Bruce; James, Saskatoon; David, barrister, at Paisley; Mrs Adam Calrns, Saugeen; Mrs T McCarrel, Mosford. To the bereaved widow and family the sympathy of the community is extended.

The funeral will be held on Thursday to Queen Hill cemetery.—Times.

FEELS LIKE A NEW WOMAN

As Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Dispelled Backache, Headaches and Dizziness.

Piqua, Ohio.—"I would be very ungrateful if I failed to give Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound the praise it deserves, for I have taken it at different times and it always relieved me when other medicines failed, and when I hear a woman complain I always recommend it. Last winter I was attacked with a severe case of organic weakness. I had backache, pains in my hips and over my kidneys, headache, dizziness, lassitude, had no energy, limbs ached and I was always tired. I was hardly able to do my housework. I had taken Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound on one other occasion, and it had helped me so I took it again and it has built me up, until now I feel like a new woman. You have my hearty consent to use my name and testimonial in any way and I hope it will benefit suffering women."—Mrs. OPHRA TURNER, 431 S. Wayne St., Piqua, Ohio.

Women who are suffering from those distressing ills peculiar to their sex should not doubt the ability of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to restore their health.

If you want special advice write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co., (confidential) Lynn, Mass. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

THE ARMORED TRAIN IN WAR

HAS BEEN MUCH IMPROVED SINCE BOER WAR.

And It Has Guns Which Fire High-Explosive Shrapnel Shells.

The armored train is stated to have been the idea of Lord Fisher, and it played a prominent part in the Boer War, where it proved highly serviceable in spirited attacks upon roving parties of the enemy, and also in patrol duties. But in reality it was a somewhat crude weapon. An engine was combined with a flat deck truck to form a single unit, the whole of which was enclosed in a steel plate envelope. In general appearance the train resembled a steel box, the walls of which were continued upwards to a sufficient height to protect the marksmen when standing upright upon the deck of the truck. The whole of the engine was encased so as to secure complete protection of the vital parts, only the top of the funnel being visible.

The walls of the train were loopholed to facilitate rifle fire, while, in some instances, provision was made also for the mounting and manipulation of machine guns. These novel weapons of war created considerable astonishment and produced decided discomfiture upon their first appearance among the unsophisticated Boers.

Locomotive in Centre.

But the armored train of to-day is a far more formidable and useful military weapon. In one or two instances, what might be described as armored railway motor cars, similar to those which was utilized in the South-African War, have been brought into service, but their value is relatively negligible when ranged against a foe, which depends vitally upon its artillery.

It is an armored train in the fullest interpretation of the term, since it comprises a number of vehicles coupled together, with the locomotive placed in the centre. This central disposition of the locomotive is decidedly advantageous and enhances the formidable character of the train. An equal number of vehicles being attached to either end of the propelling vehicle and a similar armament being carried in each section, the train has complete command of the country on all sides of the railway.

This train, however, is not improvised from existing stock, but is of special construction. The vehicles are of the two four-wheel truck type with substantial steel girder framing.

The walls are of heavy steel plate carried from floor of the truck to the roof. In some instances the walls are vertical, but in other cases they have an inward slope. In the former instance the vehicle is roofless, but in the latter case a roof is provided, thus securing protection against shrapnel fire. The forces accommodated in the open armored truck, however, are extended, a measure of protection, since on either side of the vehicle a semi-roof is fitted, supported by vertical steel posts rising from the floor of the truck. This protection is closely similar to that adopted in the trenches, and, to a certain degree, performs the self-same purpose, because the marksmen are protected from shell fire while at the loopholes with which the walls are dotted.

extends from end to end of the train, so that the members of the crew have free movement and are able to concentrate their efforts at any desired point. Some idea of the roominess of the vehicles may be gathered from the fact that meals may be cooked and enjoyed aboard with every comfort. The outstanding feature of the armored trains, however, is the artillery equipment. Light guns, throwing high-explosive shrapnel shells, are placed at intervals. The guns are centrally mounted and provided with steel shields for the benefit of the gun crew. The walls of the truck on either side of the guns are fitted with doors so as to facilitate the transference of ammunition. The guns are so disposed as to be trained through a fairly high elevation, and may also be swung through a complete circle so as to be fired upon either side of the line.

The installation of guns of such calibre upon an armored train is somewhat unusual, but it enhances the fighting value of the train to a very pronounced degree, as experience has shown. One might wonder how a train could possibly withstand the recoil arising from the discharge of a weapon, but owing to the solid and heavy construction of the truck, and the fact that the centre of gravity is placed somewhat low, the whole battery of guns may be fired simultaneously over one side without imperilling the stability or the safety of the train in the slightest degree. In fact, when a broadside is discharged, the only perceptible effect of the recoil is a slight "kick" sideways on the part of the train, and the flying open of the doors on the depressed side.

Although confined to the rails, the armored train has come to be regarded as a substantial force and difficult factor with which to reckon in warfare.

IS LIFE GROWING LONGER?

Scientists Say It Has Steadily Increased.

We often hear of people of former times having lived to a great age, and we have been led to believe that it was a common thing in days gone by to live longer than we do now. There are early historical records of individuals who lived hundreds of years. The more we advance in scientific knowledge of past conditions the more reason there appears to doubt the literal truth of these statements.

We must take into consideration that these stories of long ages come down to us from a time when man had no such accurate understanding of the actual passage of long periods as we have to-day. They did not have our calendar as a basis for reckoning.

Men who have made a study of the subject tell us that the people who are said to have lived to such great ages in the past probably did not live as long as we know is possible to-day, as the period then recorded as a year was probably much shorter.

Scientific investigation has given us reason to believe that the average duration of life has steadily increased. More attention is given now to the care of our bodies. We have improved living conditions, made them more sanitary and have learned to fight, check and eradicate diseases which formerly were regarded as necessarily fatal.

Records show that people live longer to-day than only a few years ago, and it is concluded that the average length of life is greater now than at any time in the world's history.

HAVE HAD ENOUGH OF WAR.

The German Soldiers Are "Fed Up" With It.

Some remarkable instances have come to light of German soldiers who are getting sick of the war. A lance-corporal in the Gordon Highlanders in a letter to his parents tells of the interchange of opinions men of his regiment had on Christmas Day with German soldiers in the trenches. The Germans, he writes, are "fed up" with the war, and will not fire unless the British soldiers do. They admit that they have been bluffed by the Kaiser, and say they were told the Germans had captured 160 guns from the Russians, but knew now that it was all lies. One fellow, who was a teacher in England, when asked what he thought of the war, said, "The war is finished here. We do not want to shoot." An even more remarkable incident is vouched for by a British officer. He says that one day a German who had been slightly wounded in an attack on the British was pulled into one of our trenches. He at once said, "Give me a rifle. I have lived 27 years out 30 in England, and it is time some of those swine over there were wounded." He fired at the Germans all day, and was taken to the rear a prisoner in the evening.

WHEN YOU CAN'T SLEEP.

Watching Breathing Will Soon Lull You to Slumber.

If you are troubled with insomnia let your breathing mesmerize you. The objection to repeating the alphabet over and over, or counting up to thousands, or counting imaginary sheep jumping over a stile is that you must keep your mind awake to keep on doing them. As soon as the mind drowses the process is apt to stop, and this stopping is apt to jerk the would-be sleeper back from the very edge of sleep. That is why these plans so often fail.

But watching the breathing needs no mental effort. It goes on whether you think of it or not, and the soothing regularity of it is apt to lull the mind speedily to slumber. It will fill the mind, too, and prevent all other thoughts from entering, getting the louder as sleep comes nearer.

The plan is not to think of the breath as coming from the rising and falling of your chest, for this makes you think of chests, then of colds, and so on, till your mind is distracted with scattered thoughts again. The correct way is to keep your eyes, in imagination, looking at the breath as it comes from the nostrils.

On the Road!

"Has he reformed?"

"Not exactly. He is just flirting with conscience."

First Countryman—We're doin' fine at the war, Jarge. Second Countryman—Yes, John; and so be they Frenchies. First Countryman—Ay, and so be they Belgians and Rooshians. Second Countryman—Ax, an' so be the Allies. I do be oncertain where they come from, John, but they be devils far fightin'.

SIR DAVID BEATTY.

Hero of the Big Victory Over Germany's First Line Ships.

Two previous episodes in the career of Rear-Admiral Sir David Beatty, K.C.B., M.V.O., D.S.O., hero of the big naval victory over the German fleet, prove him to be a very brave man. He led a forlorn hope to try and disable some Chinese guns, and proposed to the only daughter of a multi-millionaire. Though he had 900 bluejackets to help him he failed to silence the guns and got wounded in the attempt. With only one ally to assist him he silenced the millionaire's objections and married that ally. But then he is a very handsome man. He is such a jolly one, too, that it is impossible to help liking him. Even those over whose heads he has passed swear by him and bear him no grudge. It seems only natural that he should command—he is so strong, so fearless, so resourceful. So says a writer in the London Tatler.

Many good things as well as horses come out of Ireland, and David Beatty was one of them. He is the son of a soldier, Captain D. L. Beatty, of Borodale, County Wexford, and was born forty-three years ago. When thirteen he entered the navy, and as midshipman put in some time on board the royal yacht, the Victoria and Albert, whose first lieutenant at the time was the Hon. (now Sir) Stanley Colville. The two men were destined to meet again.

While serving in the Mediterranean in 1896, Beatty was landed with the naval brigade as second in command under Colville, and did excellent work in getting the gunboats over the cataracts. Every one said that he was so handy and quick. Indeed, he was just about this time be- ginning to be known as a fast man (not about town), and he has been getting faster ever since. At Hafir, Colville was wounded and Beatty took command, and the men who served with him that day say that the way he silenced first the enemy's gunboats and then disabled their guns in the forts at Dongola was "a fair treat." At any rate he got a D.S.O for his trouble.

Jumped Over 395 Heads.

Two years later he was at Atbara and Khartoum, when he was mentioned in despatches, got a medal as well as the 4th Class Medjidie, was made a commander, and did a record in the way of jumping, i.e., over 395 men's heads. He was only twenty-seven. It was about then that the navy began to discover that these really had got hold of an infant prodigy and that he was getting fairly into his stride, for in 1900 when commanding the Barfleur he made a most dashing attempt to silence two Chinese guns at Tientsin during the Boxer Rebellion. Even though twice wounded he still gallantly advanced with the two bluejackets in the storming party attempting an impossible task. He proved, however, that he possessed just that quality which used to make Marshal Soult so angry. "These English," Soult used to say, "know nothing about war, they never know when they are beaten." For this exploit David Beatty was made a captain—a captain at twenty-nine. Great Nelson's ghost, something was wrong! Grey-haired men shook their heads and feared that the service was going to the devil. But Beatty, quite unabashed by their prophecies, proceeded the next year to make another conquest and married Ethel, the only daughter of Marshall Field, the American multi-millionaire. Rumor had two remarks to make concerning the marriage, the one that every evening after dinner Admiral Beatty drank to his wife's beautiful eyes, and this not merely as an excuse to have an extra peg. The other that Mrs. Beatty would not allow her husband to take a title. However, now that he has been made a K. C. B., his wife becomes Lady Beatty, doubtless very much against her will. How Americans are maligned. He has a splendid town house, a fine shooting and fishing at Invercauld, where he has entertained royalty, and a beautiful place in the shires. Was their ever a more lucky man? But stop. One bit of bad luck he has had. Some years ago thieves broke into his residence, Brookby Hall, Melton Mowbray, and robbed him and his wife of thousands of pounds' worth of jewellery and valuables. They did the thing quite in motion picture style, with a motor car, shaded lamps, etc., and they got off safe with the swag. None of the booty was ever recovered save Beatty's medals and decorations, which in their haste they dropped in the grounds.

Rear-Admiral at 39.

When thirty-nine years of age he was made rear-admiral, and so became an infant prodigy, was by far the youngest admiral in the service. Even Nelson was a year older before he got flag rank. Years ago, however, Rodney, who was thirty-one, and Keppel, who was thirty-seven when made admirals, beat him in the race for promotion. Still he has not had much to complain of from fortune, for in addition to the trifles already mentioned he was made an A.D.C. to the King, one of whose shipmates he formerly was, and on Mr. Churchill coming into office he could not resist a man of such dash and courage as Beatty, and made him Secretary to the First Lord of the Admiralty. "He is undoubtedly a man of ability, but don't you think he is rather too inclined to run risks," said a colleague to Winston. "There is only one thing he would rather run and that is a horse," replied Churchill. And Beatty is fond of horses; was there ever an Irishman who was not? Because it runs in the family, his brother, Major Charles Beatty, is one of the most successful trainers at Newmarket.

History-Making Days.

History has filled pages rapidly of late. In 1913 Admiral Beatty hoisted his flag on the battle-cruiser Lion as rear-admiral of the battle-cruiser squadron. In June of last year he and his ships were entertained by the Russians at Revel and Kronstadt and immediately afterwards in the Kiel Canal by the Kaiser. What Englishman could have pierced the fog of German deceit and treachery, and known that even when feasting them the Kaiser had decided on war—that "the day" was at hand! On July 20 the King called Admiral Beatty on board the Victoria and Albert and personally invested him with the Order of K. C. B. By this time the muttering of the coming storm were audible. How it broke all of us know.

Vice-Admiral Beatty's luck is, of course, phenomenal. Ever since he was a middy he has always happened to be in the right place at the right moment, and by the same token he has always been able to take full advantage of the opportunities that have offered. As a writer of despatches he is by no means a dullard, as his despatch on the Bight of Heligoland affair shows. What a vivid pen-picture of the power of the battle-cruiser Lion we have in the following words: "At 12.50 p.m. sighted and engaged a two-funnelled cruiser ahead. Lion fired two salvos at her which took effect, and she disappeared into the mist burning fiercely and in a sinking condition."

At the time these two salvos were fired the enemy cruiser was steaming at high speed at right angles to the Lion, who was herself steaming at 28 knots. Then She was sighted again at 1.25 p.m. steaming S. E., and with colors still flying. Lion opened fire with two turrets, and at 1.35 p.m., after receiving two salvos, she sank, a fortunate end of what will be later

A GUARANTEED MEDICINE FOR LITTLE ONES

Baby's Own Tablets are a good medicine for little ones. They are guaranteed by a Government analyst to be absolutely free from the opiates and narcotics found in so-called "soothing" mixtures. They cannot possibly do harm—they always do good. Once a mother has given them to her little ones she will use no other medicine. Concerning them Mrs. Jos. Desrosiers, St. Alphonse, Que., says: "Baby's Own Tablets saved my little one's life when he was suffering from worms, and I would not be without them." The Tablets are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Guard the Tongue.

You would not think of taking your neighbor's life or wounding him with any physical weapon. But you perhaps do not realize that when you say an evil thing about him you are wounding him more grievously than you could possibly wound him with gun or dagger. You may be killing his reputation, which may be a worse calamity to him than killing his body. It is strange indeed that this terrible item of wrongdoing is so easy and so widespread. It is hard to understand the peculiar pleasure which many people seem to feel in saying unkind things about others. Bad as it is simply as a breach of good neighborliness and good citizenship, it is unspeakably bad from the standpoint of Christianity and the teachings of Christianity's founder.

But, alas! The things we want to do are usually the things we shouldn't.

The automobile has it on the horse in one respect. It doesn't shed its hair in the spring.

ENGLISH SPARROW A PEST

HAS BECOME VERY TROUBLESOME IN AMERICA.

Spread All Over the Country in the Space of Sixty Years.

The English sparrow was introduced into America about 60 years ago, and is now distributed over nearly all of the United States and Southern Canada. This rapid dissemination is a result of the bird's hardiness, extraordinary fecundity, diversity of food, aggressive disposition, and almost complete immunity from natural enemies, says the New York Sun.

Ned Dearborn, biologist of the Department of Agriculture, is severe on the English sparrow. He says they are cunning, destructive and filthy, although admitting that sparrows consume quantities of weed seed and in summer numerous insects.

During an investigation of birds that destroy alfalfa weevil in northern Utah English sparrows were found to be feeding their nestlings largely on weevil larvae and cutworms, both very injurious to alfalfa. Wherever this birds proves useful it is entitled to protection and encouragement.

Under normal conditions its choices of insects may be unfavorable. Out of 522 English sparrow stomachs examined by the biological department of the Agricultural Department, 47 contained noxious insects, 50 held beneficial insects, and 31 contained insects of practically no importance. The Agricultural Department does not say what was found to the credit or discredit of the other 394 specimens examined. A report on only one quarter of the specimens examined can hardly be considered satisfactory to earnest people enquiring into this subject.

Destroys Fruits.

The English sparrow is condemned for its destruction of cherries, grapes, pears, peaches, buds and flowers of cultivated trees, sprouts and vines. In the garden, the scientists say, sparrows eat seeds as they ripen, nip off tender young vegetables, especially peas and lettuce, as they appear above ground. We have never experienced this trouble although sparrows are "abundant about the garden. They are a nuisance, with their mess, building nests in troublesome places, in the gutters on the roof, causing the water to overflow and littering up the building generally, but this is the worst charge we are able to bring against the English sparrow.

Mr. Dearborn says the English sparrow reduces the number of some of our most useful and attractive native birds, such as bluebirds, house wrens, purple martins, tree swallows, cliff swallows and barn swallows, by destroying their eggs and young and by usurping nesting places. It attacks the robin, wren, redeyed vireo, catbird and mocking bird, causing them to desert parks and shade trees of towns. Unlike our native birds, whose place it usurps, it has no song, but is noisy and vituperative. It defiles building and ornamental trees, shrubs and vines with its excrement and with its bulky nests.

No where is the English sparrow included among the birds protected by law, and as individuals and flocks have an extremely narrow range, each flock occupying one locality, to which its activities are chiefly confined, they are easily exterminated. When a place has once been cleared of sparrows it will be some time before it is reoccupied.

English sparrows are good to eat, and their use as a food is recommended because of their nutritive value and as a means of reducing their number. Sparrows feed in close flocks, and when thus assembled a large number may be killed by a charge of shot from a small bore, 12, 16 or 20 gauge Parker shotgun. Sparrows can be baited by scattering grain about, shooting the birds and then rebaiting the places. The baiting places should be far enough apart so the birds at the second and third feeding places will not be frightened by the discharge of the gun at the first flock.

Traps Are Best.

In many places traps must be employed where a gun cannot be used or where it is not desirable. Besides being safe, properly designed traps have other advantages. Native birds caught in the traps can be liberated unharmed and trapped sparrows can be kept alive for food like poultry. In Europe sparrows have been utilized for food for centuries. In captivity the birds must be kept clean, supplied with fresh, clean water daily. A variety of food is required to keep them in good condition; bread, oats, wheat, corn-meal mash, lettuce and cabbage will be relished.

To mercifully kill a trapped sparrow place the thumb nail at the base of the skull and dislocate the neck by hard and quick pressure. To dress sparrows cut off the legs, the wings at the outer point and the neck close to the body; strip off the skin, beginning at the neck; make a cut through the body wall extending from the neck along the backbone till the ribs are severed, then around between the legs to the tail, and remove the viscera.

Sparrows may be cooked by any of the methods employed for reed-birds or quail, and compare favorably with the best kinds of small game.

We rarely appreciate game for the food itself, but more often for the name. Several years ago a party of duck hunters arrived tired and hungry at a tavern near the shooting grounds, and where they were to put up for the night. The host has the reputation of setting a splendid table, the food usually consisting of fish or game.

A bird pie was served for dinner and all agreed that it was delicious, the best quail pie they had ever tasted.

In England sparrows are trapped with a sieve, one end held up by a short stake to which a long string is tied. The trap is baited with bread crumbs, oats or wheat. The birds are permitted to eat the bait until a number have gathered under the sieve, when the cord is pulled, removing the stake and allowing the trap to fall over the birds gathered under the sieve.

HORSE POWER.

How and Why the Term Came to be Used.

Many years ago, before most of the motors of to-day were thought possible, man used the horse to turn the wheels of his machinery by means of a tread-mill. In this way the horse came to stand for a unit of power according to the size of the machine he could work effectively.

When engines began to displace horses, because they could develop several times the motive power, it was natural to refer to their capacity on the basis of a horsepower unit, by speaking of an engine as being able to do the work of two, three, four, five or more horses. And so the custom was established of making use of the term as descriptive of power.

The fact is that a "horsepower"—or simply h.p. as it is generally figured in engineering descriptions—really means a greater power than is expected of a horse and greater than he is capable of. It means the power to lift 30,000 pounds one foot in one minute.

The continued use of the old term to indicate this modern unit of power for an engine or motor illustrates how, for want of a suitable substitute, custom will keep alive a term that has lost its apparent significance.

Why Lead Is So Heavy.

Although lead is the softest metal in general use it is very dense. That is, its particles are very compactly united, and there is no room for air to circulate in between these particles. Most all other solid substances are penetrated by more or less air, and this, of course, affects the weight in proportion to the bulk. A piece of wood is lighter than a piece of lead of exactly equal bulk because the little particles which make up the piece of wood are not very close together, and it contains a lot of air.

DON'T HAWK, SPIT, SNEEZE, CURE YOURSELF! BREATHE "CATARRHOZONE"!

Gives Instant Reliefs. Clears Out Nose, Throat and all Breathing Organs

In this fickle climate, repeated colds very easily drift into Catarrh.

The natural tendency of Catarrh is to extend through the system in every direction.

Exposure to cold or dampness intensifies the trouble and nasal catarrh is the result.

Unless a complete cure is effected, inflammation passes rapidly to the throat, bronchial tubes and then to the lungs.

In using Catarrhozone you don't take medicine into the stomach—you just breathe a healing piney vapor direct to the lungs and air passages.

The purest balsams and the greatest antiseptics are thus sent to every spot where catarrhal trouble exists, germs are killed, foul secretions are destroyed, nature is given a chance and cure comes quickly.

Colds and throat troubles can't last if the pure healing vapor of Catarrhozone is breathed, sneezing and coughing cease at once, because irritation is removed.

Use Catarrhozone to prevent—use it to cure your winter ills. It's pleasant, safe and guaranteed in every case. Complete outfit $1.00. Smaller size 50c., at all dealers.

Hints for the Home

Winter Breakfast Foods.

Hot breads for breakfast are almost a necessity in winter. At least they are highly desirable. The morning appetite in cold weather demands something substantial, and it gladly takes this substantial dish in the form of a muffin, a roll or some other tempting bit of bread.

Here are some recipes; not new, but, nevertheless, good. Better, perhaps, because they have been tried and found satisfying and reliable.

Plain Muffins. — One egg, well beaten; a tablespoonful of butter and a tablespoonful of sugar, with a teaspoonful of salt, all beaten until very light. One cup of milk, three of sifted flour and three tablespoonfuls of baking powder. One-half graham and one-half rye meal may be used instead of wheat flour or two cups of cornmeal and one of flour. Drop on well-greased patty pans and bake twenty minutes in a rather quick oven or bake on a griddle in muffin rings.

Twin Mountain Muffins. — One-quarter cupful of butter, one-quarter cupful of sugar, one egg, well beaten; three-quarter cupful milk, two cupfuls flour, two teaspoonfuls baking powder. Cream the butter, add gradually the sugar, then the eggs. Sift the flour and baking powder thoroughly and add to the first mixture alternately with the milk. Bake in hot buttered gem pans 25 minutes.

Sour Cream Biscuits.—Four cupfuls flour, one teaspoonful soda and one teaspoonful salt sifted together, one pint sour cream. Roll out on a floured board, having the dough one inch thick. Cut with biscuit cutter and put the biscuits in a greased pan just touching each other. Bake from twelve to fifteen minutes in a hot oven.

Cornmeal Rolls. — 1½ cupfuls of white flour, three-quarter cupful of cornmeal, four teaspoonfuls baking powder, one-half teaspoonful salt, one tablespoonful sugar, two tablespoonfuls of butter, one egg, three-quarter cupful of milk. All measurements level. Mix and sift dry ingredients into a bowl, chop butter in with knife, beat egg, add milk and add all to dry ingredients to make a soft dough that can be handled; add more milk if necessary; turn onto a floured board, toss lightly and roll out one-half inch with rolling pin, cut with round cutter, put a piece of butter size of a pea in centre of each round; fold round in centre so opposite edges meet, put onto a buttered baking sheet; rub the top with milk and bake in a quick oven twelve to fifteen minutes.

Coffee Buns. — Sift together two quarts of flour, a pinch of salt and a teacupful of fine granulated sugar. Make a hole in the middle of this, pour in one pint of home-made yeast, and mix thoroughly; then stir in one-half teacupful of melted butter. Mix to a stiff batter with lukewarm sweet milk; knead into a smooth dough and let it stand in a warm place overnight. In the morning knead again, roll out lightly and cut with a biscuit cutter. Put in a greased baking pan, allowing about one-half inch between. Brush the tops with milk and sprinkle with granulated sugar. Bake in a moderate oven for about 30 minutes.

Southern Corn Bread.—Sift two cupfuls of cornmeal twice with an even teaspoonful of soda and as much salt. Beat two eggs very light. Mix one teaspoonful of sugar in three cupfuls of buttermilk or loppered milk, add the eggs and a tablespoonful of melted butter, lastly the prepared flour. Have ready three well-greased deep jelly cake tins (warmed), divide the batter between them and bake in a quick oven.

Some Flourless Recipes.

In these days when flour is rapidly increasing in price, housewives should try and see what they can accomplish in the bakery line without the aid of that usually all important item—flour. The recipe for "Potato Biscuit" should prove good. Take two cups flour, three tablespoons shortening, three teaspoons salt, two cups mashed potatoes, about two cups milk. Mix as ordinary biscuit and roll thin. Bake in quick oven.

Another one for "Bran Bread" is given, and to any housewife whose income has not risen with the price of foodstuffs, either of these recipes should be of value in helping to feed a hungry brood. Bran Bread.—One cup molasses, two teaspoons baking soda (dissolved in hot water and added to molasses); stir well until batter foams, then add one pint of sweet or sour milk, one quart of bran, two cups of wheat flour, one teaspoon salt. Mix well and bake one hour in slow oven. This makes two good-sized loaves of fine health bread.

Useful Hints.

Salad vegetables are as important in the winter as in the summer dietary.

An excellent stew is made of soup meat and macaroni, flavored with tomatoes.

A few drops of ammonia in the dishwater will brighten the glass and silver.

Bread and butter spread with chopped dates makes excellent school sandwiches.

To pad the edges of doilies before embroidering them, work them in a coarse chain-stitch.

To slice bacon properly, slice down to the rind; do not attempt to slice through the rind.

Paint the handles of the garden tools a bright red; they will be hard to lose and easily found.

If you spill ink on the carpet, put salt on it immediately; it will help remove the spot.

To do away with the sound of a watch in a sick room, place the watch under a tumbler.

Suet may be kept fresh by chopping roughly and sprinkling it with a little granulated sugar.

Wrap cheese in a cloth moistened with vinegar if you would keep it moist and free from mold.

Button loops will be much stronger if the loops are crocheted over with a fine crochet hook.

When milk boils over, sprinkle salt on the stove at once; this will counteract the unpleasant odor.

A small piece of camphor in the water in which cut-flowers are put will make them last much longer.

Condensed milk is cheaper and as good as fresh milk for the making of cocoa, puddings and ice cream.

Carrots cut in circles, boiled till tender, then salted, served piping hot and sprinkled with chopped parsley are delicious.

When you paste labels on glass jars that are used for spices or cereals, put the label on the inside; it will stay more securely.

A good sauce for lamb is made of currant jelly, broken up and mixed with finely chopped mint leaves and a few shavings of orange rind.

Cold rice left over from a meal can be made into an appetizing dish with tomato sauce, minced onion, butter and seasoning. Bake half an hour.

Lemon juice is invaluable in removing stains resulting from potato parings or fruit picking. First dip the fingers into salt, and then apply the lemon.

DISEASE BEATS THE GUN.

Eighty Per Cent. of Deaths in War Due to Disease.

Notwithstanding modern medical science, eighty of the deaths in the present war are due to disease, as against twenty due to gun fire. These are the figures compiled by Dr. F. N. Sandwith, writing in the Hospital, London. This same proportion obtained during the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78. During the American Civil War there were three deaths to disease to every one from wounds; that is to say, a mortality due to disease of sixty-six and two-thirds per cent.

During the French expedition in Madagascar in 1895, according to the writer, only twenty-nine deaths occurred in action as against seven thousand who died to disease. In the Boer War the losses from disease were enormous, notwithstanding the improvements in military hygiene then in force.

The Japanese, however, during the war with Russia were able by exercising the most scrupulous care to reverse the ratio. In the case of their troops only one man died of disease to every four who died of wounds.

RANDOM SAYINGS.

It is hard for a woman to hold her husband's love when she can't even hold her tongue.

Life is made up of surprises. Have you ever noticed that the things that don't seem possible happen so often?

No Human Eye Perfect.

Measurements of human eyes demonstrate that there is probably no such thing in the world as an absolutely perfect eye. That would be a miracle, which nature with all her infinite ingenuity has never performed. No human face among the world's 16,000,000,000 may be held perfect, either artistically or physiologically. To the owner of the face this is relatively an unimportant matter, but to the owner of the pair of eyes an error of one three-hundredth of an inch in the curvature of dimensions of the eyeballs may make their all-important function abnormal, resulting in eye-strain with its attendant physical ills.

THE TOLL GATHERER

The fall rains had undermined a section of the track and played mischief with a quarter of a mile of embankment. What was more serious, the hill stream, which had risen like the Ganges at flood time, had weakened two piers and the retaining walls of the railway bridge. Doucy, one of the company's civil engineers, had been sent up post haste from Delhi to repair the damage. He was to get the day laborers from the village three or four miles down the valley. They had helped in building the road, and could therefore be relied upon.

Doucy found the job longer than he had expected. The wrecked embankment did not present unusual difficulties, but the repairing of the stone work was a more serious matter. Under the pressure of the seething flood, the big stones that held the workmen were continually slipping their cables, and either taking a few tons of water aboard at a gulp or sinking altogether. Then the donkey engine had to fish out as many of the stone blocks as its grappling hooks could seize and yank up the scow. The men clinging to the network of life ropes below the bridge had to be rescued and induced to attempt the dangerous work again; all of which used up valuable time.

As the camp was large, it was necessary to send a bullock cart to the village every other day for rice, maize flour, and other food supplies. During the second week one of the carts did not return. The next day a foreman who had gone to investigate found it in the road with a broken-necked bullock between its shafts. Some twenty or thirty yards from the rim of the bank that ran along the roadside lay all that was left of the driver. The spoor of a large tiger led off into the jungle, but Doucy and his trackers failed to run the beast down.

Several days later the same thing was repeated. Another dead bullock lay in the red dust almost on the same point where the first had been killed. At the tail of the cart was the driver's empty gun; the body of the driver was found under a tangle of flowering creepers.

Doucy ordered a goat and its kid to be tethered on the bank, and that night and the night after he took up the watch on a little platform built in the branches of an adjacent tree. But the tiger did not appear. As he had to keep himself fit for his work, the engineer let one of his assistants take his place in the tree on the following nights. Meanwhile the cart was sent out with a bodyguard of four picked men besides the driver, and this executed, it made several trips without mishap.

The coolies began to snap their fingers when the toll-gatherer, as they had dubbed the tiger, was mentioned. He was a coward, they declared. He could overpower a driver asleep on his cart, but his heart failed him when it came to facing several armed men. They would burn his whiskers on the camp coals yet if he did not look out.

Suddenly, however, a mad bullock cart came spinning into camp with the ashen-faced driver crouching among its rice bags. All the others had been killed and eaten, he declared; only his own extraordinary courage had saved his life. The attack had come like a bolt from the blue, and no vigilance could have forestalled it. Presently three of the escort, dust and covered with sweat, came running into camp; the fourth had been killed. The survivors all agreed that everyone had been brave and that the toll gatherer was invulnerable.

Everyone now realized that this was an unusually determined man-eater. The coolies refused to drive the supply carts, and were almost ready to break camp in a body. Doucy saw that he must himself get rid of the toll-gatherer if he wished to retain his workmen.

He made his arrangements with some ingenuity. Out of some brown cloth and a framework of bamboo he put together a figure that when stuffed with grass was a fair imitation of a man. He wound a dirty turban round its head, added clippings from the tail of his horse for hair, and roped the thing to the seat of the cart. The following day he got into the body of the cart with his rifle and drove to the village.

Nothing happened so that trip or the next, but Doucy did not give up. On the third trip he kept as close a watch as ever, and was particularly careful on his way back from the village. It was a very hot afternoon. The groaning and squeaking of the unoiled wooden wheels were the only sounds to break the heavy silence. The red dust rolled up round the cart in clouds. Doucy occasionally lifted his head warily to scan the surroundings, but all he could see was a red shimmer of heat waves melting into a brassy glare of sunlight. The decoy sat oscillating on its seat with its turbaned head bowed forward in the exact manner of a sleepy driver. The dummy had been greased with cocoanut oil and well pawed and handled to make it "smell right"; it seemed lifelike enough to deceive a hungry tiger.

Doucy lay face down in his nest between the bags, with very little except his khaki-covered back in view. As they neared the end of the ridge he heard a peculiar sound like a passing gust of air; it was followed by an almost noiseless but very jarring shock. He threw up his head in time to see the decoy torn loose from its fastenings, in the clutch of a huge tiger. The pair instantly rolled from the cart, and the bullock wheeled and dashed straight at the bank. In its desperate terror it actually scaled the lower part of the slope; but perceiving that it could not escape in that direction, it wheeled again sharply. The quick turn tipped over the badly balanced cart; it came down like a box on Doucy and the provision bags.

All this happened in half a dozen seconds. Doucy had hardly realized his position when he heard a moaning bellow from the bullock, and knew that the tiger had grappled it.

Pinned on his back between the provision bags, Doucy felt the toll-gatherer give the dead bullock a tug that made the solid cart quiver; but the harness held. The tiger was puzzled, and the first time he snarled. The sound was powerful and murderous. Then the tiger started to circle the cart to see what the matter was. When he had gone halfway round, his footfalls ceased, and Doucy heard his heart pumping and thudding in the ghastly silence.

Then he became aware that one of the tiny chinks between the bags no longer showed a thread of sunlight. Something had blocked it. He knew what it was before he heard the deep raucous intake of air with which the tiger drank the odor of human flesh.

Doucy struggled to reach the rifle lying under his feet. The toll-gatherer tore at the obstructions. With a dry and horrible sound his claws ripped one of the bags.

As the great paw gutted it of its contents, Doucy felt the bag loosen; then it collapsed like a deflated balloon, and the cart settled a little on that side. It relieved his cramped position just enough to enable him to grasp his rifle. He instantly thrust the muzzle under the edge of the cart.

He had not a second to waste and, with the butt of his rifle pressed to his side, fired where he knew the beast must be. The answering roar of the tiger showed that he had been hit; but he was not crippled, for he threw himself upon the cart with great fury and tried to tear away the side with his teeth. Failing in that, he pushed his paw under the edge of the cart, and his unsheathed claws, sweeping fiercely through the low opening, narrowly missed Doucy's face.

Doucy aimed again instantly and fired. The toll-gatherer gave another roar that ended in a deep, gurgling cough that told of a wound through the lung. Doucy heard a heavy thrashing round and the rattling of gravel against the side of the cart. Then everything was as still as death except for the pounding of his own heart.

Bathed with sweat and half stifled by the close, hot air under the cart, he waited a long time. There was no sound outside except for the buzzing of hundreds of flies about the bullock.

At last Doucy began to push away the dirt under the edge of the cart with the butt of his rifle, and when he had scooped a shallow trench he cautiously stuck out his head.

Directly in front of him and a little below him, with ears laid back and body gathered in a tense crouch like a cat at a rat hole, was the toll-gatherer. His mouth was open, and Doucy saw that his fangs, which at one time must have been unusually large, were broken and decayed like those of most man-eaters. He aimed his rifle at the knot of frowning muscles between the fierce eyes, and was about to pull the trigger, when the tiger leaped.

But the effort was too much for the wounded beast. Just as Doucy shifted his aim and fired he saw the great body crumple in mid-air. It fell only a few feet beyond where it had been crouching, as limp as a rag. The toll-gatherer had made his last leap.

Doucy crawled out from under the cart and cut off the stiff black bristles from the fixed, snarling lips. The coolies would burn them on the camp coals that night with impressive ceremony. Doucy was a thoroughly practical man, but he knew that native superstitions had to be considered. Probably the men would spoil a half day of work by dragging the tiger into camp the next morning and holding a triumph over the body. At any rate, the road was open again; the toll-gatherer would collect no more tolls. Fisher Ames in Youth's Companion.

True Heroism.

He had been courting the girl for a long time. It happened on Sunday night, after church. They were sitting very quietly on the sofa, and she looked with ineffable tenderness into his noble blue eyes. "Tom," she murmured, "didn't you tell me once you would be willing to do any act of heroism for my sake?" "Yes, Mary, and I would gladly reiterate that statement now," he replied. "No Roman of old, however brave, was ever fired with a loftier ambition, a braver resolution than I." "Well, Tom, I want you to do something real heroic for me." Speak, darling, what is it?" "Ask me to be your wife. We've been fooling long enough."

A street car inspector was watching the work of the green Irish conductor. "Here, Foley, how is this?" he said. "You have ten passengers and only nine fares are rung up." "Is that so?" said Foley. Then turning to the passengers he shouted: "There's wan too many as yez on this car. Get out of here, wan av yez!"

INTERNATIONAL LESSON, FEBRUARY 21.

Lesson VIII. The Death of Eli and His Sons.—1 Sam. 4. 1-18. Golden Text, James 1, 22.

Verse 1. Israel went out against the Philistines to battle.—The Philistines were last mentioned in Judges, chapters 13 and 16. It was evident that Israel was not able to throw off the yoke of the Philistines. This servitude lasted for forty years (Judg. 13. 1). It terminated about the twentieth year of Samuel's judgeship (1 Sam. 7. 13, 14).

Eben-ezer, "stone of help," and Gilgal, "heap-of-stones," had a special significance (Josh. 4. 20). Ebenezer is at the head of the Vale of Sorek, where Israel defeated the Philistines (see next lesson, 1 Sam. 7. 12).

Aphek means fortress. It was one of the strongholds of Samaria in northern Sharon, where the Philistines assembled twice, once before they invaded Israel and once before they crossed the plain of Esdraelon. It was not far from the Mizpah of Benjamin, and was undoubtedly the Aphek of Josh. 12. 18.

3. People means the army. The elders had a council on the evening of the defeat and resolved to send the ark of the covenant of the Lord in battle.

Wherefore hath Jehovah smitten us to-day before the Philistines.—This was the cry of the former time (see Josh. 7. 7).

4. The people.—Here, again, the army is meant. As we read in the book of Judges repeatedly, in those days there was no king in Israel. And no whatever action was taken seemed to be the concerted action of the army.

Shiloh was not many hours distant from Aphek, as the ark was brought the next day.

Who sitteth above the cherubim. The cherubim were conceived as bearing the Lord upon their wings (see 2 Sam. 6. 2; 2 Kings 19. 15; Isa. 37. 16).

6. In the camp of the Hebrews.—This is the name by which the Israelites were known to their neighbors (Exod. 1. 15, 16. 19; 2. 6, 11, 13; 3. 18; 5. 3).

7. There hath not been such a thing heretofore.—The Hebrew word for "heretofore" is yesterday and the third day, meaning the day before. This was a common expression among the Israelites (see Gen. 31. 2, 5; Exod. 4. 10).

8. These are the gods that smote the Egyptians with all manner of plagues in the wilderness.—Not only did the Israelites never forget the deliverance of their forefathers from Egypt, but this incident had become so fixed as tradition that the neighbors of Israel knew there of. The Philistines, therefore, were exceedingly disturbed when they saw that this same God was come into the camp of Israel. By "in the wilderness" is meant the shores of the Red Sea (Exod. 13. 20; 14. 3, 11, 12).

9. Be strong and quit yourselves like men. Saint Paul uses similar words in 1 Cor. 16. 13, "Quit you like men, be strong." This heathen people was able to rally its forces by an appeal to the manhood of the army.

11. And the two sons of Eli.—The man of God (1 Sam. 2. 30) had prophesied that both of Eli's sons should die in one day.

12. And there ran a man.—Runners among the Israelites were well-known persons. As there was no other means of quick communication, men who were particularly fleet of foot were developed for messenger service. Well-known cases of runners were Cushi and Ahimaaz (2 Sam. 18. 19-31), and Asahel (2 Sam. 2. 18). There were also running footmen who accompanied the chariots. These runners became professionals, as is indicated in 2 Sam. 15. 1; 1 Kings 1. 5.

His clothes rent, and with earth upon his head.—Indicative of bitter grief. Those who saw him running thus would know that his message was unfavorable (see 2 Sam. 1. 2; 2 Sam. 15. 30).

13. By the wayside watching.—This was doubtless a street leading to the watch tower (2 Sam. 15. 2; 2 Kings 11. 6, 19).

18. When he made mention of the ark of God.—Eli as priest of God was particularly responsible for the ark of the covenant of the Lord. He had allowed "the people" to go to the very extreme measures of taking the ark into the battle in order to win the victory. When the ark was taken, therefore, he knew that there was no other help. The shock of this disaster was too great for him to stand.

Fell from off his seat.—This seat, or throne, had no back. The fact that Eli fell backward, however, indicates how great was the excitement which resulted from the words of the messenger.

WALKERTON

We are informed that the salary of the senior judge of Bruce is $3000 per year, which with the surrogate fees added, brings it up to about $4000 yearly.

Mr N C McKay took a class of twenty-one students, who were attending the agricultural course at Dobbinton, to the O A C, Guelph, on Friday, where they viewed the different departments and had classes in stock-judging. The class at Dobbinton, whose membership totalled 125, was the biggest of its kind ever assembled in any county in Ontario.

Mr Wm Louther, a farm laborer of Greenock, dropped dead on Monday of last week as he was entering the bush to cut wood on Mr Jos Carter's farm near Knightsville. The deceased, who was apparently in his usual health, partook of a hearty breakfast, and with Mr Carter and Mr Wilson drove to the bush to commence the day's work, when after getting out of the sleigh he suddenly reeled and fell, and on going to his aid the two were horrified to find that he had dropped dead. The cause of his sudden demise is ascribed to heart failure.

An English family who some time ago came to town was discovered by parties in such a destitute state that no food had been in the house for three days prior to the find. The husband was out of work, and the mother, who was willing to hire out or take in washing, had been unable to find employment, and thus starvation was threatening the stricken family when their pitiable condition was discovered and relief furnished. Besides aid from numerous private sources, the home was thereupon furnished with flour, butter and other food by the town council. There was not only a scarcity of food, it seems, but also a sad deficiency in warm clothing for the family. As the lady had two brothers killed in the war, both of whom left large families in destitute circumstances in England, the sacrifices that some homes are making for the cause is enough to shame some tax-payers who are growling at the patriotic grants certain municipal councils are making.—Herald and Times.

SECOND CON ELDERSLIE

Florence Young is laid up with an attack of tonsilitis.

Jas Gribble has purchased a colt from W J Allen.

Mrs J Hunsfather, Mrs N McMahon and Mr Jas Metzwell, of Paisley, attended the funeral of the late Mrs Paterson on Thursday last.

Mrs A McCulloch, Master Archie and Miss Pearl Craig of Chatsworth, are visitors at Mr D Allen's this week.

The 2nd con S S, about forty five strong, drove to Chesley in sleigh loads on Tuesday evening to attend the union evangelistic services that are being held in Geneva church for two weeks.

While sleighing on Friday Edna, the little six-year-old daughter of W J Allen, had the misfortune to fall and cut her forehead — the sleigh, in falling a cassy overturned her right eye, which required a couple of stitches.

Spring is coming. Crows came to celebrate St Valentine's day.

Clarence, the son of Mr and Mrs Pete Catts, is dangerously ill with spinal meningitis.

Mrs Frank Flood, of Chesley, a former resident of the concession, was stricken with paralysis on Thursday, and is in a very precarious condition.

Mr A Gross, from near Lucius Bentinck Tp, has purchased lot 36 from Jas Nichol, getting possession March 1st.

Mr Colin McArthur, of Chesley, visited his friend, J Caldwell, on Sunday.

After an illness extending almost five and a half years, Mrs Wilson Patterson, or, passed peacefully away on Monday evening, Feb 5th. Mrs Patterson, whose maiden name was Margaret Hope, was born in Cumberlandshire, England. With her parents and other members of the family she came to Canada in the year 1856. They lived near Brampton for a few years. In 1867 they moved to Eldersle and settled on the 2nd con on the farm now occupied by John Ward, where up to ... ar ago she bore the burdens of pioneer life. ... ided in Chesley for a short time, and about ... years ago she was united in marriage to Mr Patterson, and again came to the 2nd con. Mrs Patterson was a great sufferer from rheumatism for a number of years, but about five and a half years ago she was stricken with paralysis and since that time she was almost a help less invalid. Much sympathy is expressed for the devoted husband and other members of the family who so tenderly cared for her during her illness. Besides her husband she leaves to mourn her loss one brother and four sisters—Edward Hope, Mrs Geo Ward, Chesley; Mrs M McMillan, 5th ... Mrs Jas Maxwell, Paisley, and Mrs John Ward, ... The funeral on Thursday afternoon was largely attended Rev W Wallace, rector of the church of England, officiated. The remains were laid to rest in Chesley cemetery.

CARGILL

The conundrum social held under the auspices of the Methodist Ladies' Aid last Thursday evening was a grand success. A large crowd attended and an excellent programme and supper were provided.

Some of the boys journeyed to Walkerton to play a game of hockey with the boys of that town on Thursday night. The score was 5-3 in favor of Walkerton.

Misses Jessie and Phyllis Cargill spent a few days last week with Her Mr and Mrs Geo Mason of Hanover.

Mr Joseph Clancy made a business trip to Toronto on Saturday.

Mr and Mrs W D Cargill and family went to Toronto Monday. Mr Cargill will be attending the Legislature.

Mr Geo Welsford has sold his house and property to Silas Hanrahan, who lives west of the village. Miss Hanrahan will take possession March 1st.

EDEN GROVE

Miss K Emery, who has been organist of the Methodist church for some time past, has resigned. On Friday evening a number gathered at Miss Emery's home and presented her with a purse of money. A very suitable address was read by the pastor and a very enjoyable evening was spent in social chat.

Miss K Lovell Sundayed at her home near Smithfield.

A number of the youths from here went to Paisley Saturday night and enjoyed a skate on the rink and a supper at the home.

Chas Reed's horse had the misfortune to step in a hole in the road and overwrenching with the hind foot which caused it to go lame badly. The horse will be laid up for some time.

Miss Eva Taylor and Miss Della Reed were in town Saturday.

Mr Jack Howe, of Lovat, and Chas Reed drove to Walkerton on Monday evening to see the hockey match between Walkerton and Listowel. They report a fine game, the score being 7-3 in favor of Walkerton.

Mr J Taylor is busy hauling flour to Walkerton and other points for Birrell & Son of Pinkerton.

BELL ART PIANOS

Are selected by musicians because they know the Bell to be the one piano from which they can get results.

The Bell illimitable repeating action makes the touch lighter—the response is quicker—it is easier to play on. If easier for the musician it will be easier for the student — therefore the Bell is the best to buy.

The Bell is made by the largest makers under the British flag. Be patriotic and buy the Bell!

We also handle Organs, Sewing Machines, Edison Phonographs and Records.

PATRIOTISM and PRODUCTION

Complete Your Plans Now

The important thing now is to complete at once your plan for the year's work—for increased production. By planning well in advance, each month's operations can be carried through more effectively when the time comes. Delays later on, through neglect of this, will mean loss to you and to the Empire.

Use the Best Seed

This year, for the sake of the Empire, farmers should be exceptionally careful in the selection of seed. Cheap seed is often the dearest. If every Canadian farmer would use only the best varieties, and sow on properly cultivated soil, the grain output of Canadian farms would be doubled. Deal only with reliable seedsmen. Write at once to Canadian Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, and to your Provincial Agricultural Department for information as to the best varieties of seed to be used in your particular locality, and use no others.

ATTEND YOUR CONFERENCE

Clean Your Seed

All grain intended for seed should be thoroughly cleaned and selected to retain only the strong kernels. You can reap only what you sow. It does not pay to sow weeds. Clean seed means larger crops and helps to keep the land clean. When you have your seed grain ready, put it through the cleaner once more.

Test Your Seed

Test your seed for vitality, too. Seed is not always as good as it looks. For example, oats, quite normal in appearance and weight, may be so badly damaged by frost that their value for seed is completely destroyed. If you have any doubt as to the quality of your seed a sample may be sent free to the seed laboratory at Ottawa, or Calgary, for test. But in most cases this simple test will prove sufficient:—

Take a saucer and two pieces of blotting paper. Place seed between blotting papers. Keep moist and in a warm place. In a few days, you will be able to see whether the vitality is there. Neglect to test your seed may mean the loss of crop.

The Farm Labour Problem

The Government suggests the forming of an active committee in every town and city, composed of town and country men and women. This committee would find out the sort of help the farmers of their locality need, and get a list of the unemployed in their town or city, who are suitable for farm labour. With this information, the committee would be in a good position to get the right man for the right place.

Councils, both rural and urban, Boards of Trade and other organizations could advantageously finance such work. Every unemployed man in the town or city who is placed on the farm becomes immediately a producer, instead of a mere consumer and a civic expense.

Increase Your Live Stock

Breeding stock are today Canada's most valuable asset. The one outstanding feature of the world's farming is that there will soon be a great shortage of meat supplies. Save your breeding stock. Plan to increase your live stock. Europe and the United States as well as Canada will pay higher prices for beef, mutton and bacon in the very near future. Do not sacrifice now. Remember that live stock is the only basis for prosperous agriculture. You are farming not speculating.

—Fanny Crosby, the blind hymn writer, author of "Rescue the Perishing" and "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," died a few days ago at her home in Bridgeport, Connecticut. Had she lived until the 24th of March she would have been 95 years of age. She had been married to Alexander VanAlstine, a blind composer, who died in 1902. The deceased authoress was blind from infancy and during her long life composed nearly 6,000 hymns and songs, many of which became famous.

—The most appropriate personal gift that can be given this year is a History of Bruce County, which we are offering in clubbing rate with Advocate. Order now as the number of copies is limited.

—Anonymous letter writers have been very busy in Paisley of late. The disguised hand in which epistles to the town authorities continue to be written does not conceal the fact that two or more are the product of the same brain. The writers are very badly informed as to points on which they seek to enlighten the authorities, and would be a most unreliable source from which to draw evidence. Whether it be masculine or feminine hand there is a doubt. Most prefer to believe it not from woman's hand, for "there is a vile, dishonest trick in man, more than woman." But if it be a man, he lacks "that resolution and confidence in doing and saying which is the grace of the true gentleman." Neither can he be just, for "a just man cannot fear." 'Tis not out of charity that the letters are nameless indited, but fear, and "all fear, but fear of Heaven, betrays a guilt, and guilt is villany." He may be a great sinner himself, for "it is a custom with the guilty to think they set their own stains off by laying aspersion on some nobler than themselves." There is altogether room for speculation as to whether the authors would in the open appear as they pose to be, the greatest moral authorities in the community, or are in reality emissaries of Binetanic majesty ambushed behind moral issues. They may be more perfect than those whom they would have prosecuted, but evidently have no intention of allowing their imperfections to be exposed to public criticism or contempt. Of a truth, it would be a pleasure to know the anonymous individuals, so that one could, as with a piece of cloth, "turn them over and see their threads."

—Mrs. Alice Sinclair has gone to Lake Couchiching to take a course in kindergarten teaching in Toronto, with the intention of taking classes of Paisley tots under her care. Such an adjunct to our school system will no doubt be welcomed and supported by Paisley parents.

—The old-fashioned tea-meeting held in Knox church on Friday evening was such a pronounced success in every way that it is altogether likely to be restored to its old time place in the calendar of that congregation and again become an annual event. The ladies provided a bountiful supply of viands that were served for tea in the basement, and for over two hours the tables were occupied by successive relays of people who sat down to partake of the bill of fare and enjoy the opportunity of mingling sociably with their fellows. The programme carried out in the auditorium was varied and very much appreciated by the audience. The choir was occupied by the pastor, Rev. G. C. Little, B.A. Short addresses were given by Revs. Diehl, Pacey and McEwen of the three sister denominations in town. A recitation was given by Miss C. R. L. Fisher, solos were sung by Miss May Warren, Messrs. F. C. Ryan and P. Foster, an anthem, patriotic songs and choruses by the choir, also duetts by same singers completed the entertainment. The proceeds amounted to over $73, which, after paying expenses, will be used principally in furnishing the new vestry room in the basement.

—Mr. J. G. Murdoch, reeve of Lucknow, died very suddenly on Sunday night, from an attack of acute indigestion. Mr Murdoch was a leading merchant of the town, and one of the most versatile members of the county council. He was a prominent Liberal, having been president of the riding association. He was 57 years of age.

—Mrs Roberts went to Detroit on Wednesday, being called to the bedside of her daughter, Miss Maggie McCallum, who is very seriously ill in the hospital there. The young woman was operated on for removal of cancer some time ago, but the malady again broke out, and now she also has blood poisoning in her arm and an attack of pneumonia, so that her condition is very alarming. Later—Word was received by telephone on Tuesday afternoon that the patient had succumbed to the attack and that Mrs Roberts would arrive here with the remains on Wednesday night. The funeral will take place on Friday, but the hour is not yet announced.

SOME VIVID WAR STORIES

GIVE PERSONAL TOUCHES OF DOINGS AT THE FRONT.

Irish Spirit Irrepressible — Sea Fight As Seen From An Engine Room.

The war mailbag is just now a prolific source of interest. Vivid letters from soldiers at the front or in hospital bases and scrappy notes from the tars with the "allem fleet" mirror the actualities of war with a wealth of intimate detail and picturesque personal touches impossible to the harshly censored war correspondent, writes a London correspondent.

The following is written from the front by Corporal T. Trainor:

"We have had German cavalry thrown at us six times in the last four hours, and each time it has been a different body, so that they must have plenty to spare. There is no eight hours for work, eight hours for sleep, and eight hours for play with us, whatever the Germans may do.

"The strain is beginning to tell on them more than on us, and you can see by the weary faces and trembling hands that they are beginning to break down."

Sergeant-Major McDermott does not write under ideal literary conditions but his style is none the worse for the inspiration furnished by the shrieking shell:

"I am writing to you with the enemy's shells bursting and screaming overhead, but God knows when it will be posted if at all.

"We are waiting for something to turn up to be shot at, but up to now, though their artillery has been making a fiendish row all along our front, we haven't seen as much as a mosquito's eyelash to shoot at. That's why I am able to write, and some of us are able to take a bit of rest while the others keep 'dick.'

"It's the quantity, not the quality of the German shells that is having effect on us, and it's not so much the actual damage to life as the nerve-racking row that counts for so much.

"Town-men who are used to the noise and roar of streets can stand it much better than the countrymen, and I think that you will find that by far the fittest men are those of regiments mainly recruited in the big cities.

"A London lad near me says it's no worse than the roar of motor buses and other traffic in the city on a busy day."

Gaelic Spirit Irrepressible.

The Gaelic spirit has not deserted Sergt T Cahill under fire. He writes:

"The Red Cross girleens with their perky faces and their sweet ways are as good men as most of us, and better than some of us. They are not supposed to venture into the firing line at all, but they get there all the same, and devil a one of us dare turn them away.

"Mike Clancy is that drull with his larking and bamboozling the Germans that he makes us nearly split our sides laughing at him and his ways.

"Yesterday he got a stick and put a cap on it, so that it peeped up above the trench just like a man, and then the Germans kept shooting away at it until they must have used up tons of ammunition."

A wounded private of the Buffs tells how an infantryman got temporarily separated from his regiment at Mons, and lay concealed in a trench while the Germans prowled around.

Just then he thought they had left him for good teg, troopers left their horses at a distance and came forward on foot to the trench.

The hidden infantryman waited until they were half way up the slope, and then sprang out of his hiding place with a cry of "Now, lads, give them hell!" Without waiting to see the "lads" the Germans took to their heels.

Kilt a Poor Uniform.

Why Highland kilts are not the ideal uniform for modern warfare is concisely summed up by Private Barry:

"Most of the Highlanders are hit in the legs . . . It is because of tartan trews and hose, which are more visible at a distance than any other part of their dress. Bare calves also show up in sunlight."

Private McGlade, writing to his aged mother in County Monaghan, bears witness to the oft-made assertion that the German soldiers object to a bayonet charge:

"I am out of it with a whole skin, though we were all beat up, as you might expect after four days of the hardest soldiering you ever dreamed of. We had our share of the fighting, and I am glad to say we accounted for our share of the German trash, who are a poor lot when it comes to a good, square ruction in the open.

"We tried hard to get at them many times, but they never would wait for us when they saw the bright bits of steel at the business end of our rifles."

From Men in the Fleet.

Equally interesting are some of the letters from men with the fleet. Tom Thorne, writing to his mother in Sussex, says:

"Before we started fighting we were all very nervous, but after we joined in we were all happy and most of laughing till it was finished. Then we all sobbed and cried.

"Even if I never come back, don't think I've died a painful death. Everything yesterday was as quick as lightning.

"We were in action on Friday morning off Heligoland. I had a piece of shell as big as the palm of my hand go through my trousers, and as my trouser legs were blowing in the breeze I think I was very lucky."

A gunroom officer in a battle cruiser writes:

"The particular ship we were engaged with was in a pitiful plight when we had finished with her—her funnels shot away, masts tottering, great gaps of daylight in her side, smoke and flame belching from her everywhere. She speedily heeled over and sank like a stone, stern first. So far as is known, none of her crew was saved. She was game to the last, let it be said, her flag flying till she sank, her guns barking till they could bark no more."

What naval warfare seems like to the "black squad" imprisoned in the engine room is described by an engineer of the Laurel, who went through the "scrap" off Heligoland. Writing to his wife he says:

"It was a terribly anxious time for us, I can tell you, as we stayed down there keeping the engines going at their top speed in order to cut off the Germans from their fleet. We could hear the awful din around and the scampering of the tars on deck as they rushed about from point to point, and we knew what was to the fore when we caught odd glimpses of the stretcher bearers with their ghastly burdens.

"We heard the shells crashing against the sides of the ship or shrieking overhead as they passed harmlessly into the water, and we knew that at any moment one might strike us in a vital part and send us below for good.

"It is ten times harder on the men whose duty is in the engine room than for those on deck taking part in the fighting, for they, at least, have the excitement of the fight, and if the ship is struck they have more than a sporting chance of escape. We have none."

From a Dying Englishman.

The most dramatic letters come from the French. On one of the fields of battle, when the Red Cross soldiers were collecting the wounded after a heavy engagement, there was found a half sheet of notepaper on which was written a message for a woman, of which this is the translation:

"Sweetheart, Fate in this present war has treated me more cruelly than many others. If I have not lived to create for you the happiness of which both our hearts dreamed, remember that my sole wish is now that you should be happy. Forget me, and strive for yourself some happy home that may restore to you some of the greater pleasures of life. For myself, I shall have died happy in the thought of your love. My last thought has been for you and for those I leave at home. Accept this, the last kiss, from him who loved you."

Writing from a fortress on the frontier, a French officer says the colonel in command was asked to send a hundred men to stiffen some reservist artillery in the middle of France, far away from the war zone. He called for volunteers. "Some of you who have got wives or children, or old mothers, fall out," he said. Not a man stirred. "Come, come," the colonel went on, "No one will dream of saving you funked. Nothing of that kind. Fall out." Again the ranks were unbroken. The colonel blew his nose violently. He tried to speak severely, but his voice failed him. He tried to frown, but somehow it turned into a smile. "Very well," he said, "you must draw lots." And that was what they did.

In the Time of Moses.

The recent census taken by the British Government of all men capable and willing to bear arms has a similarity to what was enacted in the time of Moses. In Holy writ Numbers, 1st chapter, we find—"And the Lord spake unto Moses in the wilderness of Sinai . . . Take ye the sum of all the congregation of the children of Israel . . . with the number of their names, every male . . . from twenty years old and upwards, all that are able to go forth to war in Israel."

In Luck.

An incident of the popularity which the British kilted regiments enjoy in France is quoted in a letter received in Kirkcaldy, Scotland, from Paris, containing the following—"One Highlander sat down on the terrace of a cafe in the Boulevards and fell asleep. When he woke up four hours later he found a large crowd looking at him, and his table was covered with cigarettes and cakes."

CRYING OUT FOR END OF WAR

PANIC IS SEIZING THE GERMAN PEOPLE.

Hunger Grows and Hundreds of Thousands Are Dependent on Charity.

"The Germans are getting panicky." That is the remark I have heard from every neutral I have met on his arrival from Germany for the last few days, writes a correspondent at Oldenzaal, Holland.

Here, on the border, the impressions of these neutral travelers are fresh and untainted; they cannot conceal the truth, and the truth is the Germans are getting frightened of what is ahead of them. The nation, generally, however, takes things with courage and makes ready for the worst. That is what they will get, too, and they know it.

Some of my informants have traveled straight down from Konigsberg, through Berlin, Hanover, Hamburg; some have seen Munich and the southern cities; others have gone to the Rhine province, looking after their business. But the latter were greeted everywhere with gloom by their business friends. "There is no more business." That sentence has been repeated to them continuously—no business except for the manufacturers who work for the army.

The complete absence of raw stuffs is killing Germany's industry, and the plight of that country could not be worse if the battle were really raging within her own borders.

All along the Rhine, in the district once humming with industry, factories are silent and workmen idle. Misery, in spite of unremitting relief committees, is spreading rapidly.

It has long since put its grip on the poor, and is now starving the middle classes.

Poor in Sore Straits.

Food is terribly dear. The poor have no bread that is fit to eat for months, and now the "burgomeister" must feed on "war bread, which a French horse would not eat.

People feed on horse meat, and there is not much of that, because all of the horses available are snatched away by the military authorities. In many cases horses that have been wounded or worn out at the front, and are no longer of any use for military purposes, have been sent back to Germany and put under the butchers' knives.

The life of the people is correspondingly melancholy. The men who are not serving no longer have any business to attend to; the women work in hospitals or sit at home knitting for the wounded or for the men in the field.

The possibility of a final triumph is only entertained by professional pan-German enthusiasts. The German people are sick of their own "victories." They know that, with one or two exceptions, these victories never occurred. They are not so stupid as not to come to the conclusion that if only 50 per cent of these alleged triumphs actually had been true the Germans would have been in Paris, and even in London, long ago.

And the Germans are beginning to discover that they never will be in either city. Then, they say, "who start this war?"

Losing Faith in Kaiser.

For years past the feeling of the Germans was: "The Kaiser will only make war when he knows for certain that we shall win." The Kaiser in former days was infallible, and his military genius was an article of faith. But now the truth even reaches the uneducated East Prussian peasantry.

One of my informants here spoke to a peasant in a little place near Danzig, at Kriesdorf. The old man, who had fought in 1870, and who had two sons in the war, said: "Der Kaiser kann's nicht schaffen." (The Kaiser cannot do it.) There was no anger in his words, but they simply recognized that the Germany, according to her popular saying, had had "eyes bigger than her stomach," and that she could not "digest" all her enemies.

In Berlin, I was informed, the central part of the city does not appear to have changed much. The same folk about the same patriotic songs in the same cafes as they did in August and during the first months of the war. But they fail to represent the real Berliners, just as the people on the boulevards are not the Parisians.

If you simply drive away from Unter den Linden to the eastern or western sections of the city you will notice the change the war has brought. In the east, where the laborers live, everything is silent. There are beggars everywhere, and the streets are dirty, for the scavengers—old men and old women—only come out twice a week, the regular sweepers being at the front or killed.

Throngs Live by Charity.

Hundreds of thousands of the eastern Berliners are dependents on public and official charity to live and feed their children. Unemployment is increasing every day, and many elderly men have gone to the front as volunteers simply because they knew that, as soldiers, they will at least be fed and their wives provided for.

In the western districts, where the well-to-do people live, all the night cafes are closed. They tried to continue "business as usual" at first, but they remained sadly empty night after night, and their receipts were not sufficient to pay the telephone bill.

In the streets one sees nothing but people in mourning or cripples or men with an arm in a sling or bandaged head. The Berliners have long since given up the practice of hoisting flags when Wolff telegrams announce "victories." But they all say they will only put up their flags when Wolff announces peace. They have had enough of the war, especially the women.

I have heard much of the German women's strong desire to make peace—peace at all costs. They have been the principal losers in this war. They have lost those dear to them, and when their husbands, their sons, their brothers or their sweethearts have been brought back alive but crippled for life or wounded it has been their lot to nurse and to comfort them.

They have had to be "saving" in their household and in their dress, which is a most difficult thing for a German woman. They have cried all their tears; they have sacrificed everything, and while the men at least have the consolation of dying "a hero's death" or getting iron crosses, the women have had to sit before a deserted hearth and console fatherless children, and live. And live—that is the worst burden of all.

The women of Germany are beginning to realize that this war has lasted long enough. They have suffered more than their share, even more than the women in other countries, for the German casualties far exceed those of Germany's foes. They want some at least of those dear to them to come back alive, and slowly the idea is gaining ground in their heads and in their hearts that they must do something to stop the war.

What it is they do not know as yet. But the ferment of discouragement and wrath is working in millions of women's hearts, and now that it has become clear to German women that Germany cannot win they have spontaneously united in one wish, one thought, one desire: Stop the war.

WAR TIME SACRIFICES.

How the President of the C.P.R. Looks at It.

The readiness of all to go deep in the pocket, so that Canada would act worthily her part in helping the British Empire and her Allies in the present war, was expressed by Sir Thomas Shaughnessy to a newspaper representative, who spoke to him about the taxes imposed on railways, steamships, cables and telegrams.

"The individual, the community, the nation, fully understand that in war time sacrifices have to be made," said Sir Thomas. "These they are willing to undertake, as they are necessary for the integrity of the Empire. At the same time, they will accept the extra burdens with the best grace if they are well convinced that proper caution and economy are exercised in the disbursement of the extra taxes and the administration of affairs which accompany such disbursement.

"One cannot gauge the amount of trouble involved in the process of realizing these special taxes by stamps or otherwise, but all are willing in such a time as the present, to do their full duty; to put up with any trouble and to endure sacrifices. They will the more readily consent to all this if they have the satisfied feeling that all proper caution and economy have been employed by those in authority in the administration of public affairs, and especially of those special public affairs relating to our share in aiding the Mother Country. With such adequate caution and prudence, there would be nothing to regret afterwards.

"It is the duty of all of us, individuals and corporations, to bear our share of the extra burdens, which must necessarily be imposed at this time of stress. If these are wisely and prudently disbursed, so as to obtain the best and most efficacious results, as respects the public service, there will be no occasion to complain; and all these special burdens will be borne, I have no doubt, with cheerfulness by our people, who are ready to do their utmost to aid in the defence of the empire."

Couldn't Tell.

"Won't you be very, very happy when your sentence is over?" cheerfully asked a woman of a convict in prison.

"I dunno, ma'am; I dunno," gloomily answered the man.

"You don't know?" asked the woman, amazed. "Why not?"

"I'm in for life."

"So you want to marry my daughter, do you?" asked the father. "Now, what are your prospects?" "Excellent, sir," answered the young man, "if you don't spoil them."

NO LAUGHTER IN BELGIUM

STARVING MILLIONS HAVE A HATRED OF GERMANS.

In the Large Cities Most of the People Join the Bread-Lines.

"The impressions I take away from Liege are those of wonder that a people can suffer so much in silence, and of admiration for the bravery which enables them to do it."

This statement was made by Dr. H. Williams, of New York, who, at the suggestion of the Rockefeller Foundation, volunteered his services to direct the operations of the American Commission for Relief in Belgium at Liege, and is now returning to America. Continuing, he said:

"The people of Belgium never complain, but they never laugh. Their stoicism, for that is the only word which describes their attitude, would mislead even trained observers into believing that everything was going on as usual. Under the surface, however, they feel implacable hatred because of their untold misfortunes and sufferings.

"A little girl at Liege, who had been lucky enough to get a warm petticoat among the Christmas presents distributed by the commission, wrote to the American chief who sent it. My country has been devastated by the sword. Our dear cure is dead, our barometer, who was a doctor and gave all his time to the poor, has been shot, my father was shot, and I am now living with nuns, eating bread sent from America.

"In the Province of Liege alone nearly three hundred thousand, out of a population of nine hundred thousand, are absolutely destitute, and entirely dependent upon the commission for food to keep them alive. In the principal towns, Liege, Verviers and Spa, distress is most acute because the iron mines and other industries are closed. Practically the only exception is found in the coal mines, which are being worked three days a week to obtain fuel to keep the people from freezing.

"During the month I was in Liege it snowed or rained every day and when I left the Province was covered with a thick blanket of snow.

Thousands Begging.

"At Louvain and other places Belgian communal authorities are laying out boulevards and other municipal improvements planned long ago, simply to provide work for the people. They can keep this work going only three days a week, and in payment men are given paper bonds which are not negotiable outside the community in which they live.

"In the country districts of Liege Province farmers are tilling the soil, but they have no horses, and they are being compelled to sell their cattle for slaughter, and cattle fodder has been requisitioned for the cavalry. This has had two results. The first is that meat is cheaper in Liege than it is in New York, and the second that the supply of milk is rapidly disappearing.

"At least thirty thousand people line up once a day for bread and soup at twelve canteens established by the commission in Liege. You see no young men; there are only old women, children, and cripples.

"The distribution starts at half-past eight o'clock in the morning and is not finished at the principal canteen until eleven. The women place their half-pound loaves in net bags and old men wrap theirs in handkerchiefs which they hide under their coats. Then they go to another canteen to get their allowance of soup.

"Rich and poor all have to send for bread, and all get the same supply. Rich is a term of irony, but I use it comparatively to distinguish between the distressed and the destitute. Think of steel magnates, university professors, and well-to-do women accustomed to living luxuriously on investments which now bring in no income, being obliged to stand in a bread line. Within a few months there will be no distinctions to make, because practically every person in Belgium will be dependent on the canteens. Everyone's private means will have disappeared.

"Before the commission got into operation scores of small towns had no bread at all. Since I arrived at Liege we have not failed once to be able to supply rations for the people of the Province, but we have had several close shaves. No one is starving now, but the people are beginning to show signs of the strain they are under in being kept alive on so small a ration. Their faces look drawn, and they naturally fall easy victims to any infection.

"Belgian physicians are doing splendid work both in relieving distress and in attending prisoners and wounded. The communal authorities have the sanitary situation well in hand."

ON THE ROAD TO RUIN.

A Neutral Observer Says Germany Is Slowly Bleeding to Death.

A South American, who has lately been travelling in Germany, and who knows the country well, says in a letter to the London Times: "In the origin and source of all her power, her industries, her enormous foreign trade, Germany is being slowly bled to death. Banking transactions with the outside world are paralyzed, and it is only on talking with business men that one can realize what Germany is losing, or judge of the enormous labor which the British Navy has accomplished for the benefit of the allied cause. Germany began the war was an apparently almost inexhaustible supply of arrogance and of military pride. The stock is slowly diminishing. As time goes on the process will be quickly accelerated. One sees little by little," says the writer, "the wane of their belief in the infallibility of their army. That is despite the fact that bad news is as far as possible suppressed. The failure and sufferings of the soldiers are systematically hidden from the people. I returned convinced," concludes this neutral observer, "that in spite of all her efforts, great though these be beyond all ponderation, Germany will be beaten, and if the war goes to a finish the military powers of Kaiserdom will be buried for the remainder of the century."

DEADLY ANAEMIA

Nine Women and Girls Out of Every Ten Are Afflicted With This Trouble.

It is an unfortunate fact that nine women and girls out of every ten are afflicted with anaemia—which means bloodlessness—in one form or another. The girl in her teens, the wife, the mother and the matron of middle age all know its miseries. To be anaemic means to be pallid, with dark marks under the eyes. You are breathless after slight exertion. You feel worn out and depressed all day. You have no desire for food and often cannot digest what little you do take. Headaches, backaches, and sideaches make life miserable. If you sleep at night you do not feel refreshed in the morning and are utterly unfit for the day's duties. If neglected, anaemia almost surely leads on to deadly consumption. Restored health can only be obtained through the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills—the most reliable blood enricher ever discovered. These pills actually make new, rich, red blood; they bring brightness to the eyes, and the glow of health to pale cheeks. They have literally saved thousands of women and growing girls from the grave, and what they have done for others they can do for you if given a fair trial. Here is the proof. Mrs. Wm. Kiernan, Watrous, Sask., says: "I have used Dr. Williams' Pink Pills with wonderful results. I suffered for upwards of two years with anaemia in a severe form, and was doctoring all the time with no benefit. I was so weak I could scarcely walk. I suffered from severe headaches, and at times from backaches that were almost unbearable. The trouble affected my digestion, and this caused additional discomfort. Finally, through the persuasions of a friend, I began the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and I shall ever be grateful that I did so, as after using nine boxes I was fully restored to health. I would earnestly urge all anaemic women and girls to use Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, for I feel confident from my own experience that they will renew their health."

These pills are sold by all medicine dealers or may be had by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

FORMER "EMPRESS OF INDIA"

Now Completely Equipped as Hospital Ship.

No passenger steamer on the Pacific was better known than the "Empress of India," of the C.P.R. Pacific fleet, but in the last six months this vessel has suffered so many changes that she would not be recognized by her old friends. When the British Admiralty first requisitioned her, she was painted a dull grey and her fairy-like character was almost lost in the transformation. Then the Maharaja Scindhia of Gwalior and other Indian princes bought her and fitted her as a hospital ship, and as such, with the new name of the "Loyalty," she left Bombay a short time ago, repainted white with long black strips on the water line and on the deck line, with large red crosses amidships.

His Excellency the Governor and Lady Willingdon paid a visit of inspection to the ship shortly before her departure. Deck space was made for holiday seekers with idle hours is now mostly covered with beds for injured soldiers, just as all the available cabins are serving as private wards for wounded officers. On the main deck of the steamer space has been provided to fill the purpose of wards. Cleared of everything unnecessary the main deck is well suited for this purpose, for it gives two wide strips of space on each side and gives accommodation for a large number of beds in most pleasant positions on the steamer. Here rows of beds have been fitted and all the requirements of a hospital are installed. The work of reconstructing the interior of the vessel was put in hand soon after her arrival, and this work completed, the fitting up of the wards, etc., has been carried on under the supervision of Major J. W. Watson, Major J. R. J. Tyrrell and Major C. W. E. Kerr, of the Indian Medical Service. Between the two wards a small operating room has been constructed and has been completely equipped. Then here and there wherever space could be taken small wards have been arranged, while on the top deck a number of private wards for officers have been prepared. Altogether some 500 beds are available on the vessel.

HEAD OF INDIA'S MOSLEMS.

Offered Lord Kitchener His Services as a Private.

Widely travelled and as well known in the best English and French circles as in India, the Aga Khan has done more valuable work in connection with the present word crisis than any other Indian potentate by freely and wisely using his great position as the acknowledged leader of the Indian Moslems and the spiritual head of a widely-distributed section of the followers of the Prophet, the Ismailis. When the war cloud burst he was in Zanzibar on the outset of a tour to meet his followers in Africa, and he immediately telegraphed to the councils of the Ismailis within the Empire and on its borders directing the members of the community to place themselves at the immediate disposal of the local British authorities. Not having had a military training in youth fitting him for a commission he offered Lord Kitchener his services as a private, stating that it would be a profound gratification to him to stand shoulder to shoulder with his fellow countrymen and British troops. The authorities justly felt that his life was too valuable and his influence too great to permit of its acceptance.

FAR SUPERIOR TO CASTOR OIL

Baby's Own Tablets are the best medicine a mother can give her little ones. They are absolutely safe, pleasant to take, and never fail to cure stomach and bowel disorders. Concerning them Mrs. A. Sauve, Sherbrooke, Que., writes: "I have used Baby's Own Tablets for my three children and can truthfully say that I know of no other men to equal them. They are far superior to Castor Oil and I would not be without them." The Tablets are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

THE KING OF ITALY.

A Real Leader and Guide of His People.

In spite of his ministers, who wished to keep him in Rome to counsels about war matters, the King of Italy as soon as he heard of the earthquake was off to Avezzano to study the catastrophe on the spot and see with his own eyes how best to minimize the disaster. When an earthquake wrecked Messina a few years ago he and the queen were everywhere and their example quickened endeavor and mitigated misery.

The King of Italy takes his position most seriously. He thinks a king should be the real leader and guide of his people. He has learned four or five modern languages thoroughly and is well read both in literature and science.

In person, though well shaped and good looking, he is very small, not more than 5 feet 2 inches in height, but, resenting the dispensation, he has taken every care to increase his strength by constant exercise and is now a very fair athlete.

In private life the King of Italy is really a charming companion, utterly without pose or affectation, meeting every one on the frankly human level. He often says that a good book and a long automobile ride are about the keenest pleasures of life; but he has made himself an admirable horseman and soldier and his duties as soldier and monarch leave him little time given for such innocent pleasures as automobiling and reading.

The little King of Italy has both heart and head. He is determined to leave Italy greater and richer and happier than he found her; and already he has done much.

Kind words are the brightest of home flowers; they make a paradise of the humblest home.

Kidney Disease in Every Symptom

New Brunswick Lady Who Suffered for Six Years Tells How She Found a Speedy Cure.

Miscou Harbor, Gloucester Co., N.B., Feb'y 15th (Special).—"For some five or six years I was troubled with backache. I tried many tonics, but kept growing steadily worse, until I decided to try Dodd's Kidney Pills. They gave me almost immediate relief."

This is the statement of Mrs. A. Mark, well known and highly respected here. Asked to give more particulars in regard to her case, Mrs Mark said:

"My trouble started with a cold, and gradually grew worse. I had stiffness in my joints and cramps in my muscles and suffered from neuralgia. I had heart flutterings and headaches, my sleep was broken and unrefreshing and I was always tired and nervous. I had dark circles under my eyes, I was irritable and often dizzy and had a bitter taste in my mouth in the mornings. I also had attacks of rheumatism.

"It just took three boxes of Dodd's Kidney Pills to fix me up."

Every symptom Mrs Mark mentions spells kidney disease. That's why she found such quick relief in Dodd's Kidney Pills.

HOW BRITAIN TREATS ENEMY.

Prisoners to Have Old English Mansion to Themselves.

The London Daily Mail says the British Government, at a cost of $100,000, has converted Donnington Hall, Leicestershire, one of the most beautiful old halls in England, into a home of rest for captured German officers, of whom it will accommodate nearly three hundred.

There are about sixty acres of parkland, with spacious lawns and charming views across the valley of the Trent. The house is finely appointed and contains a dining room with carved oak panels, and a carved and polished elm ceiling, a smoking lounge, equal to that of a good hotel, six bathrooms with hot and cold water, and a shower bath; also a medical ward with a doctor and constant attendants. Electric light has been installed and all the compartments are heated.

There is also a canteen from which the prisoners can obtain wines and spirits of all the principal brands. They will be waited upon by German valets, shaved by German barbers and served with food by German waiters, captured in the German ranks.

Alongside the hall is an old chapel with stained glass windows, in which a German priest will conduct services. Beneath the window is the text of "Peace on Earth, Good Will Toward Men."

The Daily Mail says cynically: "One must suppose that the War Office has really at heart the idea of reforming the Prussian officers and by letting them soak in the suggestions of beauty and peace, showing them the difference between the 'Kultur' that watched Louvain burn and the culture inspired by a sunset in the valley of the Trent."

KNOW NOW

And Will Never Forget the Experience.

The tea or coffee drinker who has suffered and then been completely relieved by changing to Postum knows something valuable. There's no doubt about it.

"I learned the truth about coffee in a peculiar way," says a western woman (Tea is injurious because it contains caffeine, the same drug found in coffee). "My husband, who has for years, been of a bilious temperament, decided to leave off coffee and give Postum a trial, and as I did not want the trouble of making two beverages for meals I concluded to try Postum, too. The results have been that while my husband has been greatly benefited, I have myself received even greater benefit.

"When I began to drink Postum I was thin in flesh and very nervous. Now I actually weigh 10 pounds more than I did at that time, and I am stronger physically and in my nerves, while husband is free from all his ails.

"We have learned our little lesson about coffee and we know something about Postum, too, for we have used Postum now steadily for the last three years and we shall continue to do so.

"We have no more use for coffee—the drug drink. We prefer Postum and health."

Name given by Canadian Postum Co., Windsor, Ont. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled. 15 and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder. A heaping teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage. Instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

The cost per cup of both kinds is about the same.

How a Sick Woman Can Regain Health

READ THIS VERY CAREFULLY.

"For years I was thin and delicate. I lost color and was easily tired; a yellow pallor, pimples and blotches on my face were not only mortifying to my feelings, but because I thought my skin would never look nice again I grew despondent. Then my appetite failed. I grew very weak. Various remedies, pills, tonics and tablets I tried without permanent benefit. A visit to my sister put into my hands a box of Dr. Hamilton's Pills. She placed reliance upon them and now that they have made me a well woman I would not be without them whatever they might cost. I found Dr. Hamilton's Pills by their mild yet searching action very suitable to the delicate character of a woman's nature. They never once gripped me, yet they established regularity. My appetite grew keen—my blood red and pure—heavy rings under my eyes disappeared and to-day my skin is as clear and unwrinkled as when I was a girl. Dr. Hamilton's Pills did it all."

The above straightforward letter from Mrs J. Y. Todd, wife of a well-known miller in Rogersville, is proof sufficient that Dr. Hamilton's Pills are a wonderful woman's medicine. Use no other pill but Dr. Hamilton's, 25c. per box. All dealers or The Catarrhozone Co., Kingston, Ontario.

GERMAN WAR MASTERS.

Theologians and Schoolmasters in the Firing Line.

Great satisfaction is expressed in German newspapers that so many pastors and students of theology are voluntarily serving at the front. Of the 168 pastors who have been called to arms in the Kingdom of Wurtemburg 90 are serving at the front, and of 170 divinity students at the Wurtemburg University of Tuebingen 150 have donned the Kaiser's coat.

It appears that in the German army of the Argonne there is an entire company composed of theologians. From all German universities with theological faculties the theologians are fully represented in proportion to their numbers. Very few of them care to serve as officers or N.C.O.'s, and are said to prefer serving in the ranks, where their influence among the ordinary soldiers is stated to be very great.

It is computed that 40,000 schoolmasters are serving, or nearly one fifth of the entire number in the empire.

WHAT HIT HIM!

A Highlander's Experience at Lucknow.

Many queer things happen in war time. There is a story which is today repeated in Highland troops of a funny incident that befell one Johnny Ross of the 93rd Sutherland Highlanders at Lucknow, in India, during the great mutiny.

Before falling in for the assault on the begum's palace Johnny Ross and George Puller, with some others, had been playing cards in a sheltered corner, and in some way quarrelled over the game. They were still arguing the point when the signal was given to fall in, and Puller told Ross to "shut up."

At that moment a spent bullet hit Ross in the mouth and knocked out four of his teeth. Johnny thought it was Puller who had struck him, and at once returned the blow.

"You fool!" said Puller. "It wasn't I that struck you. You've got a bullet in your mouth!"

And so it was. Ross put his hand to his mouth and spat into it four front teeth and a bullet. He at once apologized to Puller for having struck him, and added: "How shall I manage to bite my cartridges now?"

Those were the days of muzzle-loading cartridges, which had to be torn open with the teeth when loading.

Lumbago's Misery Ceases Every Aching Muscle Cured

JUST RUB ON OLD TIME "NERVILINE."

Not necessary to drug inside!

That awful stiffness that makes you yelp worse than a kicked dog will be cured—cured for a certainty, and quickly, too, if you just rub on Nerviline.

Rub Nerviline right into the sore spot, rub lots of it over those tortured muscles, do this and the pain will go. You see Nerviline is thin, not oily. Therefore it stabs in, it penetrates through the tissues, it gets right to those stiff, sore muscles and irritated nerves that make you dance with pain. You'll get almost instant relief from muscle soreness, stiffness, aching backs, lameness or rheumatism by rubbing with Nerviline. It's a soothing liniment, and doesn't blister, doesn't burn or even stain the skin.

It's the most harmless cure in the world for Lumbago, Back Strain or Sciatica. It takes away the ache at once and ends your misery quickly.

Now quit complaining—don't suffer another day. Nerviline, that good, soothing old-time liniment will limber you up mighty quick. Get busy today, the large family size bottle. In the most economical, of course, the trial size costs but 25c. Any dealer anywhere can supply Nerviline.

Patriotism and Production Meeting

"The Duty and the Opportunity of the Canadian Farmer" was presented before audiences in the town hall on Thursday afternoon and evening by one of the strongest delegations of agricultural educationists that has ever been here. How the farmer can produce more for himself and the empire, in simple language, what these gentlemen sought to show, and the amount of valuable information imparted was so large that it was too bad to see it absorbed by only a limited number of farmers, although this was one of the largest afternoon meetings yet held.

Reeve Ballachey occupied the chair and introduced the speakers.

Mr Wm Squirrell, B S A, Associate Professor of Field Husbandry at the O A C, Guelph, took up the farm crop side of the question. He discussed it largely from the standpoint that in order to add to our production it is best to increase the production of the acres rather than increase the area of cultivation. There are a great many things that might be done that we don't do, and which would not require much more labor.

The best farmer in the world, if he does not start with the best varieties of seed, cannot get the results that he should. Results of the experiments carried on at Guelph and also at the experimental farms throughout the United States prove that the best varieties produce nearly two to one over the poor varieties. In Bruce county alone there are probably 40 varieties of oats grown, and it is not necessary that there should be more than four or five varieties. The O A C No 72 Oats have not yet been equalled by any other. American Banner is a little thick in the hull. Oat hulls have the feeding value of same weight of straw. There is a difference of about 26 per cent between some varieties. Weight of oats formerly determined quality, until it has been found that those varieties weighing heaviest were the smallest yielders.

Of barley the two varieties most generally grown in Ontario are O A C No 21 and the Manchuri. The No 21 is a little the best, tho it has not more vitality of growth and ripening. There is nothing so good as the best 6 rowed, bearded varieties. The hull-less varieties will not yield and the breakless have nothing to recommend them except being early.

Bruce county is one of the largest producers of ensilage, said Mr Squirrel, and he recommended Wisconsin No 7 as the most desirable variety of corn for silo. Early White Cap, Yellow Dent and Leaming are next in value. When one gets a good variety he should procure seed from same sources again. Dents are better than flints for ensilage, and flints are better for grain production.

There are few seasons in Ontario when the average farmer is not short of pasture for various reasons, and the question is, what are we to put in to help provide for this shortage. He strongly recommends sowing a mixture of 3½ lbs oats, 3½ lbs Early Amber sugar cane and 7 lbs of red clover, which will give a nice mixed pasture feed throughout the drought period. If oats are pastured early and kept from coming into head they will last all summer. The cane stalks are about half the size of corn and can be cut or pastured just the same as grass.

To grow alfalfa there must be certain conditions. Some have the idea that the region is too cold, but it is grown in Siberia, 800 miles farther north than Ontario. Seed that comes from Colorado, Utah and other southern parts is not adapted to this climate. Much hardier strains are being produced. Best results are secured by purchasing seed grown as near home as possible, provided it is mature. Grimm's and Ontario Variegated are best varieties. The Alfalfa Association of Haldimand supply reliable seed. Soil conditions required are a good drainage and proper kind of bacteria. Alfalfa does best in clay loam as in Haldimand, Welland and Lincoln counties. By cutting first crop for hay with yield of 2½ tons to the acre, and second crop for seed yielding 2 bushels to acre, the rate of production will average $50 per acre. A good many have spoiled alfalfa because of being a little too greedy, cutting or pasturing too soon or too close. Can take seed off second year, but better to leave until third year. There is no better time to sow than middle of July, if put in just after a rain. There are fields in Haldimand that have been cut for 15 years without being reseeded. It reseeds itself to a certain extent when left for seed crop. Sow 20 lbs to the acre. The U S sent men over the world looking for hardiest forage plants, and collected some 300 kinds. They found that Grimm's alfalfa is the hardiest to be got in any part of the world, and the second best was a variegated grown close to Cayuga, Haldimand Co, Ont. At the O A C, Guelph, plots were sown with seed from Russia, U S and Canada, and a strain from New York state produced the highest yield. It was found that this strain was originally from Cayuga. This fields can be helped by top dressing or disking, but be careful not to disk before plants are two years old. If you have to plow up alfalfa first turn some sheep in to pasture it down close.

Prof Wade, sec'y of the Winter Stock Fair and the Live Stock Association, discussed all classes of live stock raising. He reviewed the situation as to markets, gave statistics to show that in the horse trade there is likely to be a change for the better again, and advised taking best care possible in breeding for good stock. The best horses in Britain and Europe are being sent to the war, so that a tremendous waste is occurring that way, the army horses being cleaned up every four months. The best horses seen in the showrings of the U S do not compare with Canadian Clydes. Taking into consideration all the factors affecting the horse situation, Mr Wade asked "How would it look if every man in Ontario save he is not going to raise any more inferior colts?" It looks as if the Ontario man would get the market. It is up to us to see that we get into the game now so that we have the best. Select sires that not only look well but have the breeding behind. Why save a $5 bill in expense of mating mares when a superior sire is available? Mr Wade gave a lot of information on the science of breeding.

Because of the small cost of feeding sheep, Mr Wade urged farmers to get into that branch of stock raising before they get too high in price. It practically costs nothing to feed a sheep, he says, and expensive buildings are not required for housing them. He recommends a Southdown-Leicester cross for market lambs. He does not think we will see a low price for wool any more. The question as to whether sheep mature destroys pasture for cattle was brought up, but was shown that when sheep have gone over pasture closely there is no fingerlt for other stock.

It seems like putting too much value into hogs to be feeding them grain at present prices, but the speaker pointed out that there will be a tremendous demand for pigs in the near future. It appears that the man who saves consistently with hog raising will find the market come back. In the meantime there may not be a profit, but there will not be a loss. He cited the case of a man who figured out that a ton of middlings fed to hogs cost ge a lb in the pork, and this will be ve a margin of profit. Others can follow the same p an. Try tankage, one to seven of middlings. It is worth a trial. Young pigs should not be weaned at less than three or eight weeks. If prices begin to soar up the cheapest too lbs is the first. Additional weight over 200 lbs costs a lot more to put on.

Feeding of dairy cows, silos and silage, were spoken of and discussed at some length. Ensilage feed holds cows to milk better than fresh cut hay, and keeps the cows producing at highest level. The saving of losses such as those caused by allowing cows to fall off in milking for a time, or in neglecting to shear sheep at the proper time, are items that count. It is good business to substitute for more expensive feeds any meal that will affect a saving. Farmers can to advantage cooperate in buying cottonseed meal or dried brewers' grain. There is not much difference between feeding value of dried corn stalks and ensilage, but the more succulent silo contents will be craved for and more readily eaten. The man with a silo is on easy street in regard to food supply. It looks like good business to plan for building next fall, thus helping to give employment to Canadian workmen and keep manufactureres going. It pays better to silo than to cut half-grown corn for summer feed. Corn too dry to silo will mould. A silo will repay itself in two years. Have capacity of silo in accordance with amount of stock to feed. Sows have been fed ensilage and meal in winter at the experimental farm. Horses should only be fed lightly on ensilage.

Owing to conditions as they are now the farmer is in a position that looks awfully good and 1915 should be the biggest year ever.

Mr John Farrell, of Owen, made a short address which closed the afternoon meeting.

He emphasized the need of co-operation among agriculturists in Canada, and pointed out that every Canadian has got a burden to shoulder in connection with the present crisis. Along with the banker, lawyer, business man and student the farmer should not be thinking of dollars and cents alone. We are here, he said, to ask you for extra production. It does not appear advisable to plow more land, but rather to try and grow from same or create a greater amount of produce. The price is morally certain, but if prices be not forthcoming are you not prepared to make a sacrifice? He appealed for sacrifice out of a sense of duty, or out of consideration for what others are doing. If some men are willing to give life are you not ready to make a lesser sacrifice?

Prof Wade was the first speaker at the evening meeting. In starting he reminded his hearers not to forget that this is our war, and our empire is in danger. Farmers have a chance to show they are taking an interest in the nation's welfare and of doing their part.

A tribute was paid to Belgium by the speaker, and an interesting reference made to the friendship enjoyed th by the people of Prussia. Illustrating how it is controlled by the classes, the voting power being multiplied in the individual according to wealth. The power of autocratic authority is such that the chancellor of the German empire who was interviewed by a foreign paper could not tell his animosity without permission from a government official.

The more we practise in this country, said Mr Wade in alluding to the war, the freer the food supply will be for the mother country. It will be a fine thing to be able to say that we are doing the best we can. We should loosen up in expenditure as well. There is never a time that should depress us in this country. Never was there a greater opportunity for the young man on the farm.

The speaker feels that farmers are responding to the call of the times and can be sure that this good old historic country is doing its share in supporting the cause of the empire.

Mr Farrell moved his second address with a sound patriotic note, and went on to the consideration of what can be done to give assistance to Britain. The army in the field is made up of men who were producers, but are now consumers of food. It was a great asset to the country but is in no position to help feed itself, on account of the interning by Germany of the Turks.

Farmers of Canada are not in a position to change methods of agriculture, but can pay more attention to details such as in the early selection of seed grain and thus increase the yield. Do something in selecting seed, put in better than ever acres to produce vigorous seed, more plants and better plants. Do a little more in cultivation without which the maximum results cannot be attained.

What are the things we ought to grow? There is not a doubt but there will be a great demand for all cereals and rough fodders such as corn and roots. These are two of the staple articles and will be wanted.

The situation is not one of today, nor of a year, but may last for years. The throes of war may be in a good many forms but first must be produced.

Mr Farrell, who has been employed in the interests of the Dominion Exhibition Department, gave an interesting account of his first experience as a shorthorn in England, Scotland and Ireland, and of those experiences based a number of points that were new across the sea to make their home among us should be benefited. He told of the efforts made by the government to induce experienced British farm hands and domestic helpers to come to Canada, and pointed out that not ages are rid of the custom of having the best in the old country. The British investor had been losing his money in the Canadian shambles, but his capital should be secured for legitimate and safe investment with farmers co-operative societies and the like. He closed with an appeal to the farmers to take a more interest in the struggle to defeat that heretic power who says might is right as if that right were attacking their own liberty.

The gathering was in attendance in the afternoon and their names called forth high compliments from the speakers.

DOCTORS DID NOT HELP HER

But Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Restored Mrs. Bradley's Health—Her Own Statement.

Winnipeg, Canada — "Eleven years ago I went to the Victoria Hospital, Montreal, suffering with a growth. The doctors said it was a tumor and could not be removed as it would cause instant death. They found that my organs were affected, and said I could not live more than six months in the condition I was in.

"After I came home I saw your advertisement in the paper, and commenced taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I took it constantly for two years, and still take it at times, and both my husband and myself claim that it was the means of saving my life. I highly recommend it to suffering women."—Mrs Orilla Bradley, 254 Johnson Ave., Winnipeg, Manitoba, Can.

Why will women take chances or drag out a sickly, half-hearted existence, missing three-fourths of the joy of living, when they can find health in Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound?

For thirty years it has been the standard remedy for female ills, and has restored the health of thousands of women who have been troubled with such ailments as displacements, inflammation, ulceration, tumors, irregularities, etc.

WOMAN'S BEST MEDICINE

Mrs. Kelly Advises all Women to Take "Fruit-a-Tives"

HAGERSVILLE, ONT., Aug. 26th, 1913.

"I can highly recommend "Fruit-a-tives" because they did me an awful lot of good and I cannot speak too highly about them. About four years ago, I commenced taking "Fruit-a-tives" for a general break-down and they did me a world of good. We bought a good many dollar's worth, but it was money well spent because they did all that you claim for them. Their action is so pleasant, compared with other laxatives, that I found only pleasure, as well as health, in taking them. They seemed to me to be particularly suited to women, on account of their mild and gentle action, and I trust that some other women may start taking "Fruit-a-tives" after reading my letter, and if they do, I am satisfied the results will be the same as in my own case".

MRS. W. N. KELLY

"Fruit-a-tives" are sold by all dealers at 50c. a box, 6 for $2.50, trial size, 25c, or sent postpaid on receipt of price by Fruit-a-tives Limited, Ottawa.

HYDRO POWER WANTED BY DERBY TP. FARMERS

Farmers of Derby township, in Grey Co. are moving to have hydro-power. At a meeting held at Kilsyth it was decided to apply to the H. P. Commission for an estimate of cost of supplying power from Eugenia also to find how many will take power. Mr Purcell the engineer who has charge of the farm demonstrations by the H. E. Commission's work in the province addressed the meeting at Kilsyth and gave out a lot of information. To use the power for more than one purpose was, he said, the main object. When hydro comes into general use he thinks individual threshing on the farms will be the rule. The power could be used for electric incubators, etc.

The two main factors that entered into the cost of power, were the actual cost and the cost of delivery. This is divided in rural districts into what is known as cost of power charge and service charge. It was desirable to get as many users of power per mile as possible, as it is only the users of power who pay for it, unless the power is used for public service. Replying to a question as to the number of users advisable per mile, Mr Purcell said that as many as possible should be obtained; it would be necessary to have at least 3 users per mile, and the service per month for each customer would be $3. This includes the annual fixed charges on capital expended in the municipality. A charge per H.P. is then made above that. The price would be the same 1 mile from the station as 5 miles away. Those getting the service must pay the cost, but nothing more. Information was then given as to the cost of motors. A ½ h.p. 60 cycle motor cost about $60. A 1 h.p. single phase motor $90. The cost of 1 h.p. 3 phase motor would be $60. A 5 h.p. motor would cost $88. One h.p. is the amount required in most cases. Installation would cost about 50c. to $1.40 per outlet. From the road to the house each man pays his own line. 1.0 ft. of wire is provided by the commission from the main line to the first pole. The cost depends upon the amount of annual fixed charges on capital invested and operating expenses.

In reply to a query as to use of rural telephone poles for hydro purposes, Mr Purcell said as the matter was under consideration no definite statement could be made. But work on the Eugenia-Owen Sound line would be rushed to completion How the township would be served, he could not say; that would be worked out later.

Hints for the Home

Tested Recipes.

White Hard Sauce. — One-third cup of unsalted butter preferably, one cup of powdered sugar sifted and worked into the butter gradually, and flavoring. Some people use a warm bowl to mix their sauce in. A better thing is an enameled plate of the shape of a soup plate or use a warmed soup plate. Unless the butter is hard the plate will be warm enough if hot water is run on it for a minute or two, and it is then wiped dry before putting the butter into it. Chop the butter first and then knead and work to a cream with a knife or a flat egg whisk. Vanilla flavoring, a teaspoonful for this amount, is always popular, but sometimes one-third lemon or orange to the vanilla is added. Mold into a mound or any shape you choose. You may then sprinkle some nutmeg over it if you choose, as many like this flavoring in a pudding sauce. Set on ice to harden.

Harlequin Hard Sauce.—Divide a hard white sauce into three parts. Leave one-third white, work chocolate or cocoa into another third and jelly into the rest. Sift cocoa before working it in and work in enough to get a good shade. For a cup of hard sauce four tablespoonfuls would not be too much. Currant jelly may be used to make the red or pink part of the sauce, and a fine clear grape jelly gives a fine or raspberry color, though a grape jelly of an inferior quality would give a lavender shade. Put the three colors together in any shape you choose, a mound or a square or something more fanciful, so that each serving will have some of each color. One of the easiest ways to get this is to make the plain brick like a brick of ice cream of several colors.

Tree Cake Icing. — When hard sauce is colored with cocoa it is easy to put it on a cake to resemble the icing which is characteristic of the tree cake. The inside of the tree cake may be almost any plain cake preferred, but the chocolate or cocoa icing must be put on to resemble the bark of a tree, and only a butter icing can be so manipulated. But a tube and point is not needed. Just draw the joint of the spoon, rather heavy with the icing rather than clean, in lines across the icing you have smoothed on.

Fish Recipe.—Here is a nice way to use leftovers: Chop very fine one pound of cooked halibut, five drops of onion juice, two teaspoonfuls of lemon juice, half-teaspoonful of paprika, half-teaspoonful of salt; add one eighth cup of thick cream which has been beaten until stiff and the whites of two eggs beaten stiff; cook in buttered timbale molds until firm; chill on ice, remove from pans, arrange on salad dish, garnish with mayonnaise dressing; cut up fine one can of shrimp and put that around the base. Now in making salad dressing some people always use olive oil and lemon, as it is so much healthier than vinegar and so sweet.

Sweetheart Cakes. — Prepare a white cake batter as follows: To two cups of granulated sugar creamed with half a cup of butter add one cup of milk and three teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Add a saltspoonful of salt, and last of all, the whites of two eggs beaten stiff. To half of this mixture add a half-teaspoonful of vanilla and to the other half add a scant tablespoonful of chocolate powder or cocoa. Spread each batch in a sheet three-quarters of an inch thick. Bake in a moderate oven, and when done, put the white layer on the brown layer with meringue filling. To make the meringue, beat the white of an egg stiff, add one tablespoonful of granulated sugar, and beat two minutes. Then carefully cut the layers into small cakes with heart-shaped cutter. Frost the cakes with thin white frosting and decorate the top with daintily cut pieces of candied cherries and citron.

Useful Hints.

Rice with grated cheese over it makes a change as a luncheon dish.

Turpentine is said to restore the lost whiteness of the ivory handles of cutlery.

Sometimes merely bending new kinks into a hat will make it look like a new shape.

A good meat salad is made with chopped cold meat and cold boiled potatoes, onion and parsley.

Bread and butter, cheese and beans, nuts and sugar, are among the best foods for the hard worker.

An excellent dessert is made with bananas put through a potato ricer, and sliced orange and pineapple added.

Those cereals are preferable which are whole natural grains, steamed in a double boiler for 24 hours.

Before wearing your rubbers rub them well with vaseline. Let them remain a few days before wearing them.

Cream cheese and butter worked together and seasoned with salt and cayenne, make a delicious filling for a sandwich.

When clothes have become badly scented with tobacco, hang them in the open air and sunshine until the smell is gone.

Express packages that are to travel a long distance should be sewed up in strong unbleached muslin over the paper wrapping.

Always cut out the scallops of a piece of embroidery before washing. The edge will never have to be trimmed but once after the first washing.

Good pearl buttons which have been spoiled in the laundry can be renovated by giving them a bath in olive oil and then rubbing with flannel.

Discolored copper articles can be made to look like new. Rub them with lemon dipped in salt. Rinse in clear, hot water and rub with a soft cloth.

Apples pared, cored and set into a dish with sugar and water, to bake until tender, but not broken, are delicious served with custard poured over them.

When one buys a child's dress, otherwise good, but with poor machine scallops on it, one can regard the scallops as padding and work over them with excellent effect.

To take out iron rust, dip the spot into a strong solution of tartaric acid and expose to the sun. When dry wet the article with warm soapsuds, rub the stain with ripe tomato juice, expose to the sun again, and when the stain is nearly dry, wash in more suds.

A WORD FOR THE HORSE.

The Russian Soldier's Prayer for the Noble Animal.

In the present devastating conflict of nations animals play no inconsiderable share. The horse, in particular, has been dragged in great numbers to aid his master in the work of destruction, and, like his master, to suffer in his turn. It is inexpressible to any lover of animals to think that these dumb, patient creatures, with their many lovable traits, are lying maimed and tortured, enduring, who shall say what agonies, on the fields of the European struggle. The British Army is in this, as in other respects, admirably equipped, and its veterinary organization is declared to be sufficient to cope with all cases of wounded animals. One cannot be sure, however, that the same merciful provision exists among the forces of the other combatants, and there can be no doubt that thousands of disabled horses suffer cruelly until death comes to relieve them. The Germans are said, and we can believe it, to be very harsh and brutal in the treatment of their horses. The Russian soldier offers a striking contrast.

The large tenderness and the universality of sympathy that, though they have rarely managed in the past to express themselves in the government of Russia, breathe forth in every page of the best Russian literature are strikingly exemplified in the Russian soldier's prayer for his horse: "O Lord, for the humble beasts who with us bear the burden and heat of the day, and offer their guileless lives for the well-being of their countries, we supplicate Thy great tenderness of heart, for Thou hast promised to save both man and beast, and great is Thy loving kindness, O Master, Saviour of the world." It would be difficult to imagine anything further than these words from the spirit of Bernhardt. Auxiliary services have been organized to assist the authorities in mitigating the hardships of the horses used for Army purposes and in Glasgow today an appeal is being made for funds for this humane purpose.—Scotch Paper.

Too Much for a Lawyer.

A young foreigner was being tried in court, and the questioning by the lawyers on the opposite side began.

"Now, Laszky, what do you do?"

"Ven I" asked Laszky.

"When you work, of course," said the lawyer.

"Vy, work——"

"I know," said the lawyer, "but what at?"

"At a bench."

"Oh!" groaned the lawyer. "Where do you work at a bench?"

"In a factory."

"What kind of a factory?"

"Brick."

"You make bricks?"

"No, de factory is made by bricks."

"Now, Laszky, listen," said the lawyer. "What do you make in that factory?"

"Eight dollars a week."

"No, no! What does the factory make?"

"I dunno—a lot o' money, I think."

"Now, listen. What kind of goods does the factory produce?"

"Oh, and Laszky, good goods."

"I know, but what kinds of goods?"

"De best."

"The best of what?"

"The best there is."

"Of what?"

"Of dose goods."

"Your honor," said the lawyer, "I give up."

EARL KITCHENER, AUTOCRAT

WAR MINISTER RUNS THE WAR HIS OWN WAY.

Is Absolutely Oblivious to Public Opinion and Very Practical.

One of the members of the British Cabinet was in conversation with a friend not long ago. The friend said the Cabinet should take a certain course of action in a matter then on the hooks.

"I agree with you," said the Cabinet member.

"How do the other members of the Cabinet feel?"

"They agree with you, too," said the Cabinet member. "All except Lord Kitchener."

"Then," said the other fellow, "why don't you do it?"

The Cabinet man heaved a sigh.

"I assure you," said he, "that we have very little influence with Kitchener."

That may seem to be an exaggerated statement of conditions in the British Cabinet. But it is an absolutely truthful one. Kitchener is the Cabinet. With certain limitations, he is the House of Lords and the House of Commons, and the Royal family. He is easily the most powerful man in England today—no exception whatever being noted to that statement. This is the explanation, writes Herbert Corey, an American correspondent.

The leaders of every party in England recognized that this war threatened the very life of the Empire. Britannia is fighting with her back against the wall. They did the very sensible and very extraordinary thing of selecting the biggest man they had in stock to handle the war for England. Then they did the equally sensible and positively revolutionary thing of letting him handle it.

Down to Brass Tacks.

Kitchener has a distressing way of getting down to brass tacks in doing business. There was a Parliamentary inquiry into certain failures to feed and clothe the new recruits—for while Parliament is obedient it is not muzzled. The fact was shown that requisitions for necessary supplies were shuffled through half a dozen hands before they were filled. It is not likely that Kitchener had known of the delay or the cause. He is not omniscient. He got reports by telephone of the revelations. Before the examining on the floor had ended Kitchener had sent a telegram to every officer in command at a recruiting station.

Buy what supplies you need and send me the bill," was the purport of the telegram. "Never mind previous rules. Get the stuff. I'll get you if you don't."

There was one promising little scandal that went by in right away. Kitchener isn't extravagant in his use of Government money—in one of his Soudan campaigns he offered to do for £500,000 what another soldier had estimated would cost £3,000,000, and then he turned back a good deal of the money—but just now he is not counting the cost. He is too busy to fly clerk cost-sheets with audit marks. His subordinates are told to buy cheap when they can spare time—but that hours are worth any premium.

Sent Him Back to Work.

A manufacturer of khaki called at the War Office to ask for a commission. In time he was ushered into Kitchener's office. He remained standing at the door.

"Any military experience?" asked Kitchener.

The manufacturer said he had been an officer in the territorials, and so and that

"What's your business?" asked Kitchener.

The manufacturer said he made khaki.

"Have you any Government contracts?" asked Kitchener.

The manufacturer swelled with modest pride. He said he had several contracts—good contracts—which would keep his mills busy for months. Kitchener's head dropped down again over the figures he was studying. He did not speak. He just jerked his thumb at the door. The officer in attendance took the manufacturer out. That sort of man is more valuable at home just now than in the field.

Kitchener's estimate when the war began was that it would last three years. A recent incident seems to show that he has not changed his mind. A manufacturer of certain goods was asked if he could not largely increase his output.

"Not without doubling the capacity of my plant," said he. "I cannot afford to do that unless I am assured of at least three years' business."

"Go ahead and double," said Kitchener. "You'll get the business."

Absolute Autocrat.

His past history is an open book. His quarrels with slack and inefficient administrators at home and abroad are known. That his achievement in raising a new army at home and in feeding the old army in the field is of the highest order is admitted. Where Kitchener has incurred the most bitter criticism is in his management of the press. He is an absolute autocrat. He has made a joke out of that freedom of the press of which Anglo-Saxons have boasted—with this exception.

Kitchener hasn't cared what editors have said about him. But they must not print tabooed news. The English papers—especially the Harmsworth group in London—have attacked the military censorship with great bitterness. Nothing has been said on the American side of half the edge and weight of venom that is being said almost daily in England. Kitchener doesn't care. He is oblivious to public opinion.

So Kitchener has muzzled the press in this war. He has ruthlessly suppressed information which might be a weapon in the hands of the enemy or make trouble at home. He would not let the story of the sinking of the Audacious be told. He has not let the English public know that Japan intervened at Great Britain's request, or that China has protested against the violation of her neutrality by both English and Japanese troops. A long list of like actions by the censor might be cited. It is important to get at Kitchener's viewpoint.

He will not permit the publication of anything which he, as a soldier thinks may add to the difficulty of his task. He is the sole judge. Where a doubt arises, he rules against the newspapers and lets 'em rave.

But they can say anything they choose about him.

AN AMBITIOUS CHILD.

Louis Napoleon's Belief in His Destiny.

"Being a boy" meant very little to Louis Napoleon, for he had it in his mind almost from the day he was born to be emperor of the French. In a moment of confidence, he said to his bosom friend, Baron d'Ambres, who in turn confided it to his diary, now published as "Intimate Memoirs of Napoleon III."

"I have retained a very lively impression of an hour or two in my seventh year, when the idea occurred to me for the first time, and very clearly, that my destiny was not the same as that of other children: that I held something greater and more serious. But I cannot tell whether it gave me a feeling of pride or fear—perhaps both together.

"In any case, I had already illustrious names and important events to look back upon in my past. I knew that my grandmother, who was dead, had been an empress, that my mother had been a queen, and my father a king—and my uncles had been kings, too.

"I grew accustomed to the notion that I, too, should one day be emperor or king—I did not know which, although emperor sounded finer. I knew Napoleon was still at St. Helena on a rock, and he sometimes haunted me like a phantom.

"All this concluded the confession, filled my little head with gloom and sunshine, and left me pensive."

And well it might! These are not the imaginings and dreams of a child, but of a care-ridden man. But his belief in his destiny served Prince Louis one excellent turn: it made him a hard worker, deeply imbued with a sense of duty that increased with his years.

The commandant of the fortress where Louis Napoleon was kept a prisoner on account of his pretensions to the throne of France, was deeply impressed with his responsibilities, and thought it his duty to keep a careful watch on his prisoner. Fearing that the boy, in despair, might take it into his head to kill himself, he deprived him of every weapon that might serve his purpose—knives, razors, and so on. One day the prince said to him with a smile:

"Have no fear. I belong too much to the future to try to shirk the present."

PRINCESS MARY'S OWN BOX.

Was Handed to Private of Royal Munster Fusiliers.

When the Princess Mary's Christmas gifts for the British soldiers at the front were being packed, her Royal Highness went down to the warehouse at Deptford to watch the work and placed a slip of paper in one of the brass boxes. On the slip were these words:

"This box was packed by her Royal Highness the Princess Mary. The recipient should acknowledge its receipt to her Royal Highness the Princess Mary, Buckingham Palace."

There was naturally great interest in seeing who the happy recipient of the Royal message would be. The other day the slip was returned to Buckingham Palace. On it were written just the simple words:

"Thank you. Received by me, 9760, Pte. Fitzgerald, "B" Company, Royal Munster Fusiliers."

A note added by the quartermaster-sergeant said that the boxes were handed to Private Fitzgerald and his comrades on Christmas night, when the rations were sent up to the trenches.

ONE OF AIRMAN'S DANGERS

IT IS DODGING GUNFIRE OF THE ENEMY.

British Aviators Do Not Change Course Until Shells Burst Near Machine.

In the course of a recent talk about aviation in the war, with a correspondent, an officer of the British Flying Corps, now home on "short leave," referred to the difficulties and hardships that airmen have to overcome. Some idea of the discomfort endured from cold at this time of the year, despite leather clothes and woollen helmets, he remarked, may be gathered from the fact that if the air in a moist a machine will often come back with its wings coated with ice, and the men so cold that they have to be lifted from their seats.

The usual type of machine employed, whether monoplane or biplane, carries two men—the pilot and the observer. Both are experienced map readers, and the observer especially must be able to indicate definitely on the map to with in a few yards the exact position of any object he has remarked while on his reconnaissance. This is no small accomplishment, as can be understood if one remembers that the aeroplane is approximately a mile high, and travelling at a speed sometimes exceeding a hundred miles an hour over an ever varying scene in which each small road and cart track resembles another.

The Uses of the Aeroplane

may be divided roughly under four heads. The strategical reconnaissance, the tactical reconnaissance, the directing of artillery and the dropping of bombs on the army.

The strategical reconnaissance has for its object a complete survey over and beyond the enemy's lines to remark any movement of troops or guns that is taking place and to note railway trains and supply stations and many other details of inestimable value to the general staff.

The tactical reconnaissance covers a smaller area, and in greater detail. The exact position of enemy trenches and guns is noted and marked on the map for the information of both infantry and artillery.

The direction of artillery fire is, perhaps, the most interesting of any task allotted to the airmen. The aviators, having made arrangements with the commander of a battery, rise to a considerable height, from which they can observe the burst of the shells on the enemy's position. They then signal, according to the range and direction of the British guns by means of firing colored lights. Extremely successful results have been obtained by this co-operation of gun and aeroplane.

Bomb dropping is a duty that sometimes falls to the members of the flying corps, but obviously it is only now and again that they can obtain a suitable target. The accurate dropping of bombs into a trench or on other small objects is quite impossible.

When the machine has got its height it crosses the enemy's lines and at once becomes the target for furious gun and rifle fire. The Germans possess a great number of anti-aircraft guns firing shrapnel shell.

The "Archibald" Gun.

It is these guns that have been named "Archibald" by the Royal Flying Corps. "Archibald" is very energetic and often fires as many as fifty or sixty shells at an aeroplane on one reconnaissance. Owing to the noise of the engine, the airmen, perhaps luckily for them, cannot hear the whistle of the shell as it comes toward them. They are, however, fully aware of "Archibald," for again and again above the roar of the motor comes the wicked hiss of the shrapnel bullets after the shell has burst as they shoot past the machine, missing it by a few feet or even by inches. Frequently a bullet or a piece of shell will tear a hole in one of the planes. The airmen, however, pay but little attention. The observer goes on taking notes, and now and again the pilot looks around to see exactly where "Archibald" is bursting.

Should the shell come unpleasantly close for five or six times in succession the pilot may perhaps dive two or three hundred feet to put the German gunners range out. Luckily it is only when flying against wind that "Archibald" becomes really dangerous. When flying with the wind he merely becomes a waster of ammunition and a source of amusement to his target. Artillery fire at an object moving at ninety miles an hour is bound to be erratic.

For Economical Reasons.

New Lady Boarder—Mercy! What thick, heavy coffee cups they use here.

Old Boarder—Yes; the idea is that your arm will get so tired lifting one cup you won't ask for a second.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL STUDY

INTERNATIONAL LESSON, FEBRUARY 28.

Lesson IX. Samuel the Victorious Leader. 1 Sam. 7. 3-17. Golden Text, 1 Sam. 7. 12.

Verse 3. Samuel spake.—Samuel has not been mentioned since chapter 4, verse 1. The burden of his message was repentance.

4. Baalim and Ashtaroth.—Baalim, as mentioned in a previous lesson, is the plural for Baal, and Ashtaroth is the plural for the female divinity Astarte.

5. Samuel said, . . . I will pray for you.—For other instances of intercession with Jehovah see Exod. 17. 11, 12; Num. 12. 13; 1 Kings 18. 30, 37.

6. Drew water, . . . and fasted.—At the feast of the tabernacle the high priest used to draw water from the fountain of Siloam in a golden vessel and pour it over the sacrifices. The feast of the tabernacle lasted from the fifteenth to the twenty-second of the month of Tisri. The name "water-gate," given to one of the gates of Jerusalem, is supposed to have been named from this custom. In 2 Sam. 23. 16 we find David pouring out water to the Lord; although he was famishing he would not drink the water. Fasting was enjoined on the day of atonement, according to the law of Moses. The day of atonement was on the tenth of the month of Tisri. That Samuel should have observed these two feasts as preparatory to his intercession with Jehovah is indicative of his deep concern over the seriousness of the situation.

7. The lords of the Philistines went up against Israel.—This means that the whole strength of the Philistines was called upon. Just as kings and emperors to-day will go to the front in order to encourage their soldiers, so the lords of the Philistines thought it necessary to be on the midst of the battle in order that the full fighting strength and determination of the soldiers could be secured.

8. The children of Israel said to Samuel, Cease not to cry unto Jehovah our God for us, that he will save us out of the hand of the Philistines.—The Israelites fear of the Philistines was increased when they saw that the lords of the Philistines were taking part in the battle.

9. Samuel took a sucking lamb.—The very best offering was for the intercessory prayer. As to the law of burnt offerings, see Lev. 1. 10-13.

10. But Jehovah thundered with a great thunder on that day.—Instances of thunder, rain, hail, thick fog, and other natural phenomena are frequently recorded in history. Because of such an event, victory was rested with one or the other side.

11. Beth-car.—This place was on a hill close to the Philistine territory, which would indicate that the Philistines were driven back into their own land.

Samuel took a stone, and set it between Mizpah and Shen.—Mizpah is the modern Neby Samuil. Jerusalem is only five miles further beyond to the southeast. Shen means "tooth" or sharp rock (see 1 Sam. 14. 4).

13. The Philistines were subdued, and they came no more within the border of Israel. As Canaan was subdued by Israel (see Judg. 4. 23, 24).

The hand of Jehovah was against the Philistines all the days of Samuel. "All the days" means all the days of his government, as Samuel's power ceased when Saul became king.

14. The cities which the Philistines had taken from Israel were restored to Israel. Samuel conquered the Philistines not only in driving them from the borders of Israel, but by carrying the war into their own country and taking from the Philistines the cities which had been taken by them from Israel.

There was peace between Israel and the Amorites. The Israelites and the Amorites made common cause against the Philistines.

15. Judged Israel all the days of his life.—This means that he was a civil judge. He ceased to serve as a judge after Saul became king.

16. He went from year to year in circuit to Beth-el and Gilgal, and Mizpah.—Beth-el was the most important place on this circuit. Gilgal was over against Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim, and Mizpah was five miles northwest from Jerusalem.

17. For there was his house; and he built there an altar unto Jehovah.—Samuel from youth or had lived near the altar of the Lord, and in his old age did not forsake it. Where his house was, there also was the altar of the Lord.

Now He Reminded Her Of It.

"Ha! I've got a good joke on my wife."

"What is it?"

"She wouldn't give me a letter to mail because she feared I'd forget it, and she carried it around three days in her shopping bag."

When lawyers disagree it's up to the jury.

The Darkest Hour;

Or, The Hope That Still Lived.

CHAPTER X.—(Continued).

"It's no good your setting up for a saint if you're got your living to get, and especially in London," Miss Lloyd had said to her repeatedly.

"And I don't see any difference between cheating like that and downright stealing," Maggie had replied perplexedly. "If any of us were to steal a sixpence or a penny from that woman that came in just now, we would get put into prison; and I don't see that difference between taking the money out of her pocket and charging it to her extra on a piece of calico of poor quality that was offered her a few minutes before at a lower price."

"Oh, you'll be particular by a long way," Miss Lloyd had retorted with a sneer. "You're too good for this world, you are. I should get out of it, if I was you."

Poor Maggie could have found it in her soul to pray to God that she might indeed get out of the world, as she walked across this midnight desert of winter-ridden London, where the streets and houses looked as inhospitable as so many tombs. The very fact that London knows the meaning of home as foreign cities never know it, makes it seem only the more callous and pitiless to the homeless who tramp unfriended through its streets.

Over and over again the little breadwinner who meant bread for herself and those dear ones dependent on her, resolved in her mind the several items mentioned in her employer's hard-breaking catalogue of deductions from her poor wages, fifty pence a month for boot-cleaning! Why, the one overworked servant whom the offerers employed did not clean the assistants' boots once a week. She, Maggie, knew that her boots had only been cleaned twice in the whole month. Surely it was hard to charge a sixpence for such a little! And then there was the shilling that Mr. Jeffery had set down for the library subscription. There was only one shelf of books in the whole house, and as the assistants were not there on a Sunday they never had any time for reading. The other monthly shilling demanded as a contribution to the sanitary fund seemed also very unjustly deducted. When one came to consider that the doctor who was supposed to be attached to the establishment had only been seen there once during the month, and on that single occasion he had only looked in for five minutes in order to tell Miss Merriman, who was half choking with bronchitis, that nothing ailed her but laziness. It had seemed more like a miracle than anything else that Miss Merriman had recovered at all. The others had said that it was always the same; that the doctor was always hard to convince that they were not shamming, and would never believe that they were really ill until the case had become so dangerous that positive risk attached to the inevitable step of sending them home at their own expense in a four-wheeled cab. For Mr. and Mrs. Jeffery would never keep in the house a girl who was really ill; no, not even for a single day.

Remembering this, Maggie felt now in her misery that a shilling a month was quite a large sum for each of them to give to the house doctor. That shilling would have made so much difference to her now! It would have done so much for Alice poor, little injured Alice, whom the crushing tolls of London had already caught and mangled, and who now lay sick and helpless on that poor mattress in the garret they called home—sick and helpless, and, perhaps, even in this very hour, lying.

Ought she not to have gone home straight home, before setting out on this, her present desperate errand? The doubt arose in her mind many times in the course of her long walk northward. Mrs. Maitland must certainly be anxious about her already, and there was that piece of embroidered shawl that had been found with her when she herself had been found lying abandoned, a helpless infant, beneath a tree near the edge of a lonely Scottish road, ought she not to have tried to sell that before going to beg charity from Christine Dare?

Yes, surely. But to sell it to-night would be impossible. If she had known as early as seven or eight o'clock how small a proportion of her wages she would actually get, it would have been different; but she had not known till long past ten o'clock, and even if she had gone home after that the shop she would not have arrived there until midnight.

When she had gone a little more than half of the way she had to go, she found herself forced to wait a few minutes in order to recover her breath and something of the strength of which her long fight with the wind had robbed her. She recognized now that she must ride, if riding were possible. She looked out for an omnibus, but nothing in such a vehicle could be seen. She reflected with bitter disappointment that it must be too late for any chance of getting any conveyance other than a cab, and the expense of a cab was not to be thought of; at least not unless she should drop in the road.

She struggled on for two another half-mile. At the end of this she knew that there remained for her no choice between taking a cab and sitting on a doorstep in the street all night through this bitter winter night. Better the extravagance of the cab; for if she did not reach home tonight (and old Mrs. Maitland, already tortured about her sick child, would go nearly mad with anxiety. Then, if she stayed here, she might freeze; or so, at least, she felt, as she shivered here in her thin clothes. Maggie looked round now for a cab, but she was not in a neighborhood where cabs were plentiful at any time, and at this present hour, long past midnight, they were almost as rare as private carriages. The exhausted girl had to struggle on for yet another mile before the welcome clatter of hoofs and light wheels awoke the echoes of the silent streets.

The vehicle proved to be a hansom, and she got into it after carefully understanding from the driver that for two shillings it would take her as far as the corner of the stretch of common on which Brian Hardy's humble encampment had located. Lying back thankfully in this new and dearly-bought shelter, she felt at once burning and icy-cold; she could herself that she must be very ill to feel like this. Perhaps it was because she was hungry, and her purse full of anxiety to-day to eat even the small quantity of miserable food supplied to her in the shop. She had really eaten practically nothing in the past twelve hours, and she felt the effect of this injudicious self-starvation that also overwhelmed both with physical fatigue and the strain of mental anxiety, and a new and chill despair.

She tried to repeat the rules of the shop by heart as she lay back in the cab, she tried to count the number of times she would take her feet could take her. For the first ten minutes she was alone upon the road. Then, presently, she became aware of a man walking in advance of her. He was walking fairly quick, but also, as she thought, with a tired step. The craziness fear that was upon her made her alfloat afraid to pass him. She was afraid to make her presence known to him lest he should prove to be a ruffian and do her some harm. The darkness, wholly unrelieved, was very thick, too thick for her to see his outline very clearly at more than a yard or distance from him.

While she was wondering what manner of man he was, and how much farther off her destination might be, she was startled by the sound of a shot suddenly and rudely breaking the dead stillness of the night. The girl stopped, startled, and with her instinctive cry of alarm there mingled an exclamation from the man walking in front of her. He, too, had stopped in his walk, and she was near enough to him now to see him plunge aside in the direction of the hedge from behind which the shot seemed to have proceeded. "Who are you? Where are you?" she heard him call aloud. There came a noise as of the crushing of branches, the torrent of undistinguishable words; then the form of the man who walked in advance of her appeared again in the road, blackly shown up against the dim grey of the white road. She saw him stumble and fall. As he fell, he became aware of her nearness. He spoke to her appealingly through the darkness.

"Will you help me a little? I was going to the encampment — it is only about a hundred yards further on—and tell them that I have been attacked, but am not hurt, only faint from weakness? Say I tried to get hold of the man, but could not. I shall get my strength back in a few minutes, and then I will come on. I shall not want help. Only go and tell them, so that they may not be too anxious. I am late as it is."

"Are you Mr. Hardy?" Maggie Maitland asked breathlessly, pity taking the place of fear in her heart as she stooped over him.

"Yes," he answered her very low. He said no more and she knew that this was because he had become unconscious.

She left him there and ran forward.

CHAPTER XI.

"I'll go. You need not come, Christine. By the girl's account he is only a few yards off, and my help will be all that is necessary. You can comfort him when he arrives."

Lord Southport spoke the last little sentence with a good deal of reproach, of annoyance and also with something of a sneer. He and Lady Dare had been unable to persuade Christine to leave the simple little camp and drive home with them without seeing Brian Hardy again. After recovering from the spell of unconsciousness which mercifully to her in the moments that followed the giving of her heart-breaking consent to do the single thing which her mother begged of her, Christine had crossed the narrow patch of snowy grass to Brian's tent, where she expected still to find him. But in his stead she had found only Mrs. Maitland, who had told her that the young preacher, her old friend lover, had been summoned to a death-bed, and, in spite of remonstrance of his weakness, had obeyed the summons.

Lady Dare and Lord Southport, coming upon the scene just in time to hear the information, had taken it for granted that Christine would not wait, but would come back with them at once. The carriage, with its pair of thoroughbred horses, had already been waiting a considerable time. The hours might take cold. Lord Southport urged, they were all tired of longer walking up and down the bleak road at the slow pace of patient expectancy to which the others were keeping them. It had been easy to see that both he and the mother dreaded lest her fatigue and weariness with Brian Hardy should break down her fortitude, and even lead to her taking back the word which she had pledged to him:

"It will be much better if you do not see him," Southport had cautiously decided, fearful lest his treasure, recovered with so much difficulty, should a second time be lost to him. "If you feel you are bound to say good-bye to him in some way, why you can write it."

"No." The white-browed, trembling girl shook her head resolutely. "That will not do. I must see him and find out myself what has happened, even if I have to wait here for hours, or perhaps until the morning. But neither you nor my mother need be afraid out any appeal from him should cause me to take back the word I have given you. Nothing could make me do that now—not after what I have learned to-night. I am nothing now to Brian Hardy, nothing now, nothing any more. But he has loved me—he still loves me dearly—and in three weeks' time we were to have been married; I fixed the wedding day only to-night; so the least that I owe to him is to wait for him now, and tell him the exact truth with my own lips. He will understand it better so, and will blame me less."

Under her breath she had added—"God help him! God help us both!"

And so, in spite of the girl's entreaties that Lord Southport should take her mother home, joined with assurances that she herself would follow as soon as her duty of speaking to Brian should be over, the thoroughbreds still waited with the carriage at one in the morning in the chill of the snowstorm, breaking from clouds whose grey, menacing heaviness obscured the moon. The moonlight for a time of the scene had departed, just as the happiness of the lovers had departed. The sharp lash of the wind had seemed to Christine to be fierce and deadly as no lash of stormblast ever had been before. She shuddered as she waited in the cold for the returning footsteps of him whom she had loved with all the passion of her warm young heart yet to whom she must say good-bye to-night. Oh, how bitter, how terrible was life! And she could not this retaliation, which was severing her from her loved one, have come to her sooner, months sooner, before they had become so dear to each other that to part meant what it meant now—anguish and despair, unspeakable immeasurable, eternal!

And now a strange thing had happened. A girl, who was none other than Maggie Maitland, the lassie who had been her sewing maid up in the North in the bright days of the past summer, had come with the news that Brian Hardy lay fainting upon the road a hundred yards or so away from this place, and that to him was home. A shot had been fired—that they not heard it—by some evil-doer. But Mr. Hardy was not injured, however, Maggie hastened to say; he seemed to be only faint from weakness, and had fallen after his unsuccessful attempt to seize and hold the unknown assailant, who had fired at him a bullet from a gun. The only needed someone's strength to lean on, someone's arm to support him while he walked the little distance to the encampment from the part of the road where he now lay.

"I can't leave her alone," Lord Southport repeatedly protested. "There is no need for you to come out in the cold. You are ill and weak already as you can possibly be without going to bed and staying there."

But Christine thought otherwise.

"I am coming," she said resolutely. "As mother does not like the idea at the moment, it is my duty to come."

She was hurriedly putting on her plain black hat and coat, when she caught sight of Maggie Maitland's face in the full light of the lamp that illuminated the tent. She saw how changed that pretty face was, how pinched and haggard and white it looked in the bright light, how altogether from what she had been when first Christine had seen her. She had looked so blooming and happy as she had sat sewing in the pleasant dressing-room at the shooting-lodge in the summer; and here, after the snow had been a sea of sorrow of her former self—such a wreck as startled Christine to behold. In the instant of recognizing this Christine hesitated in the putting on of her hat and jacket. She turned to Lord Southport.

"After all, I will let you go alone," she said to him hastily; "this girl looks so tired that I must see that she rests, and that she has something to eat. She looks utterly worn out. Tell Mr. Hardy that I am waiting for him."

For answer, the man who, against her will, had won her back, gave a half-angry nod, then he went away. Christine then led the trembling, exhausted messenger to the comfortable chair which Brian had occupied early in the evening, and told her to rest there while something was being prepared for her to eat.

"Indeed, indeed, I must not wait. I must go home. Maggie Maitland protested, in faint and faltering tones. "They are waiting for me. I must go home. I only came to ask to ask."

At that moment she seemed too weak to finish her sentence. She was very drowsy; in another few minutes she would certainly fall asleep. Christine removed her black straw hat, which was wet with snow, and soothingly stroked her pretty, light-brown hair.

"Why, your clothes are all drenched," she exclaimed. "You have got your shoes and yet, do not trouble to tell me any thing about it now. Rest a little first. I will bring you some food, and then when you have had it you can tell me all that you have to tell. It must be a sad story, I am afraid, from what I have heard and seen since I last saw you. Poor girl! How is it that you have come to London?"

"I've come here to ask for help," Maggie summoned her failing strength and consciousness to reply. "I've only by accident that I came upon Mr. Hardy. He was walking along the road in front of me. You think that he is dead—he is not dead—for I am sure that the shot was fired with the purpose of killing him."

"Killing him!" Christine repeated sharply. Again? Would the unknown persecutor never leave Brian alone until he should have accomplished his terrible purpose? Where was the use of having three twelve willing, good men-at-arms guarding the tent if the would-be assassin grew so cunning as to watch every movement of his intended victim and to arrange his plans accordingly?

"Are you sure that Mr. Hardy was not hurt?" she bent again over Maggie as she spoke, and laid her hand upon her forehead. Her features had grown rigid with her poignant anxiety.

But no answer came from between Maggie's pale lips. She had fallen already into a heavy sleep.

Christine went out softly. Her mother was pacing up and down over the whitened grass between the outside and the tent. Heavy snowflakes were settling fast on her rich black velvet driving cloak. Christine joined her, and looked appealingly into her faded and haggard but still attractive face.

"Mother, dear, get into the carriage. It is too cold for you to walk up and down slowly out there. Let me help you to the carriage. I'll settle you in there comfortably. I shall not keep you waiting very much longer now. Brian will be here in a moment."

"You must call him Mr. Hardy in future, Christine," Lady Dare said coldly, though a little fretfully, "and I think I had better not go to the carriage until you come too. I am too nervous and anxious. My life has seemed to go all wrong lately. It was no sin on my part, was it, Christine? Or if it was a sin, it was only accidental sin. It was not wilful. Heaven knows; it was not wilful."

Lady Dare's voice died away, then continued impelled by a sudden warm impulse, she stooped towards her unhappy daughter, and, for a little, a woman caressed with herself, and tenderly kissed her.

They walked up and down together, side by side, until the two dark figures for which the blue eyes of the mother and the grey eyes of the daughter had been piercing the snowy darkness, came into sight, and slowly advanced from the road to the patch of snow. With a low cry Christine left her mother's side and went to meet them. Tender, passionate words formed themselves on her lips, but at sight of Lord Southport's face she repressed them. She asked only the question which she had asked her friend, Brian, are you hurt? and then, rescued by his answer, kept silence until they were inside the tent together. Here she expected to find Brian a comfortable chair to accord to him; but to her surprise the one thing of ease in the lingering weakness still occupied by the sleeping Maggie Maitland, and the tent was empty, and of Maggie there was no sign.

POLAND A NATION AGAIN.

Declares Count Ivan Tolstoy, Mayor of Petrograd.

Count Ivan Tolstoy invited me to his home in Petrograd with all the courtesy of the true Russian aristocrat, writes Woclaw Czerniewski in London Graphic. I arrived at his house on the very day when posters bearing the words "Petrograd for Poland" were being displayed all over the City of Peter the Great. It was natural, therefore, that our conversation should turn chiefly upon Russia's new and great movement. Count Tolstoy spoke with the combined authority of a representative of the Russian nation, of a member of the oldest aristocracy, and of a Mayor of Russia's capital. His opinions were firm and clear.

"The manifesto of the commander-in-chief is of the greatest importance," said he. "It is a wise political step. It is my desire to impress British public opinion with the fact that the whole Russian nation heartily appreciate this measure. The promise given by the Grand Duke will be fulfilled, and of this there can be no possible doubt; such, also, is the desire of our nation and of our Tsar. When the Russian army wins, the divided parts of Poland will be reunited. Poland will comprise Galicia, Silesia, Posnania, West Prussia (with Dantzig), part of East Prussia, and the present Kingdom of Poland. Poles will enjoy full autonomy. Polish will again become the language of the schools, of public life, and of officialdom. The Poles must have at least one university entirely Polish.

"In my opinion, the officials of the future Polish Government ought to have a knowledge of the Russian language, as being the language of the Empire. The Poles must have their own Diet. The institution of Governor-General ought to be abolished. This places Poland on the same footing as the other parts of the Russian Empire."

The German Influence.

"Don't you consider," I asked the Count, "that the reactionaries, the 'German party,' can hinder the realization of those promises through their powerful influence?"

Count Ivan Tolstoy.

"No, it is impossible. It is true that the Russian bureaucracy was under German influence for many a long day. The Germans gained the highest Government positions, they are still very powerful at Court, and they created a party of their own. They oppose us Real Russians. I do not believe in their patriotism for one moment, but no doubt they are loyal to the dynasty and to the Tsar. The Tsar, for his part, considers himself as the first servant of the nation. Thus, the Tsar is faithful to the nation, and the German party is faithful to the Tsar. The feelings of Poles towards Russia are now fraternal and sincere, and the Russian people entirely reciprocate these sentiments."

"Do you think, Count, that Russia is suffering very much through the war? Is there any change in Petrograd?" I inquired.

"None whatever. Everyday life is not changed in the slightest. Prices are lower. Many products which were previously exported, for example, geese, eggs, caviar, etc., must be sold on the spot, and, therefore, are much cheaper. Shipping companies are the only sufferers, the people, as a whole, gain more than they lose. In our ordinary urban undertakings we had to suspend work on account of tasks more important in time of war. And that is all. Russia is too vast, too mighty to be devastated by any war.

"Her resources are immense, and she is able to continue war for an unlimited time. But I consider that the present conflict cannot last long. The Germans cannot withstand our army. We shall drive them entirely out of our territory, and we shall carry on the war on German soil, where we shall soon manage to push them from East and West Prussia, from Posnania and Silesia. Then the Germans will be compelled to sue for peace.

Growing in Moral Power.

"Our spirit is at the highest level, and this is true not only of the army, but of the nation. It was generally said that drunkenness would ruin Russia. Meanwhile a Ukase forbidding the sale of alcohol met with universal approval. It is true that restaurants and public houses are the sufferers, but the nation is rapidly growing in moral power and wealth. The result of this new law, even after a few months of operation, is very striking. Our hospitals in Petrograd never used to have sufficient room for patients. At the present moment, in spite of the fact that many a wounded soldier is sent here to be tended, we have always plenty of room for our patients. Statistics show a wonderful decrease of illness amongst the population. And thus, even now, we can see advantages and good results which have been conferred on us by the present war. The only sufferers are those who are living in the immediate sphere of military operations, and these are actually Poles.

"The sympathetic Russian nation realizes this, and hold out help to the sufferers. The City of Petrograd sent 25,000 francs for Belgium, but 50,000 roub. s for Poland, and at the present moment throughout the town money and clothes are being collected for the Polish victims of the war. This money will be distributed amongst the population of Poland without any discrimination as to race, creed or religion. Poles, Lithuanians, Ruthenians, as well as Jews, will be assisted according to their degree of destitution.

CRAWLED OUT OF BELGIUM.

How Two British Convent Girls Fled Past German Sentries.

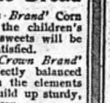
How two English schoolgirls at a convent near Liege made fruitless efforts for four months to leave Belgium after the German occupation, and how finally they escaped over the Dutch frontier on a dark night, was told by Miss Florence Walter, a Balham girl, nineteen years of age, who, with her friend, have only just succeeded in reaching their anxious relatives and friends in England.

"There were a number of other English girls at the convent," said Miss Walter, "but whenever we applied to the German officers we were refused military permits to leave. Life under the Germans was unbearable, for we were exposed to all sorts of dangers, so we decided to escape. One night my friend and myself tramped for hours through a far wood to Cheval Blanc, and then on to Verviers and Ensival. Fortunately we got two or three hours' sleep, but at four o'clock the next morning we had risen, and an hour later were setting, together with nearly a dozen others, in a merchant's cart slowly wending its way to the Dutch frontier. After a weary journey of six hours, and shivering with fright—for we did not know how our venture would end—we arrived at the little frontier village of Moulin. We visited the only inn in the village, which was crowded. For hours we racked our brains for some plan to pass the frontier guards.

"Finally we started out along the muddy roads after darkness but found we were being followed by a sentinel, so we returned to the inn. Then a man, whom we and several refugees bribed, led us through a garden at the back of the inn. On our hands and knees we groped in the mud under some barbed wire entanglements, climbed several hedges, dodged a number of sentries, and finally crossed the frontier."

Not every powerful man has been able to sustain his reputation.

The teacher had written on the board the questions, "What day was yesterday?" and "What day is to-day?" and the little girl gave these philosophical answers: "Yesterday was to-day yesterday. To-day will be yesterday to-morrow."



Spread the Bread with 'Crown Brand' Corn Syrup and the children's craving for sweets will be completely satisfied. Bread and 'Crown Brand' form a perfectly balanced food—rich in the elements that go to build up sturdy, healthy children.

Edwardsburg 'Crown Brand' Corn Syrup

is so economical and so good, that it is little wonder that millions of pounds are eaten every year in the homes of Canada.

'Crown Brand'—the children's favorite—is equally good for all cooking purposes and candy making.

Died—In Chesley, on Feb. 20th, Mrs Frank Flood in her 80th year. Deceased was one of the pioneers of this concession coming to Eldersile with her husband over 50 years ago. They settled on lot 12, con. 2, on the farm now occupied by Wm Robertson. In the year 1902 they moved to Chesley where she resided until her death. About nine days ago she was seized with a paralytic stroke and from the first attack there was but little hope entertained for her recovery. She gradually grew weaker until on Saturday morning she was called home. Beside her husband she leaves a family of six sons and three daughters to mourn her loss, who have the sincerest sympathy of the friends in this community. The funeral on Monday was conducted by Rev W Wallace, Rector of the Church of England, of which church deceased was a life long member. The service was held in the church. Interment was made in Chesley cemetery.

A Golden Wedding at Glamis

A couple of weeks ago a brief note was received by a few of the Glamis people requesting their presence at the home of Mr and Mrs S Stephenson for six o'clock dinner on Feb 9th, 1915. This proved to be an invitation to the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of their wedding. Of the members of Mr and Mrs Stephenson's family there were present Mrs McNally of Kintore, Mr Harry Stephenson of Detroit, Mrs Barons of Belmont, Mrs Colwell of London, and Mrs Brown of Glamis. In the decorations which were tastefully arranged the golden hue was predominant, and a very happy company sat down to the bountiful repast. Congratulations and good wishes were expressed by the assembled company to Mr and Mrs Stephenson on the important event in their life's journey, and the evening was pleasantly spent in song, story and reminiscences, one of the most delightful items in the impromptu programme being the recitation by Mrs Stephenson of about 200 verses of the New Testament, all of which she had memorized in her later years. A pleasing incident of the evening was the serenade by and message of good wishes from St Paul's church Y P Guild. After singing "God be with you till we meet again" and uniting in prayer the company dispersed with the expressed hope that they might have the honor of an invitation to Mr and Mrs Stephenson's diamond wedding. Many beautiful gifts were received by the aged couple.

High Price for Aqua Pura

It is rumored in town that one of our young citizens who was in the retail booze business put up a slick trick on thirsty citizens of this town before he struck out for Chicago. The current report is that shortly before he left, knowing that a summons would soon be issued to hail him before a magistrate's court, he filled several empty whiskey bottles with pure water from the town waterworks, and representing that he had to get out before receiving a summons, made a special offer of the bottles at one dollar each, the regular price being one dollar and twenty-five cents. The bargain prices appealed to the fancies in a big way and they purchased pure spring water from the town taps at one dollar per bottle. If the whole reservoir could be sold at the same price Chesley's debt of about $100,000 would soon disappear. Jack Hetherington, the town engineer, would neither eat nor sleep till he had the debt wiped off and a big surplus piled up.—Chesley Enterprise.

PATRIOTISM and PRODUCTION

Pin Your Faith to Live Stock

The one outstanding feature of the world's farming is that there will soon be a great shortage of meat supplies. Save your breeding stock. They are today Canada's most valuable asset. If you sacrifice your breeding stock now, you will regret it in the near future. Plan to increase your live stock. Europe and the United States, as well as Canada, will pay higher prices for beef, mutton, and bacon, in the very near future. Remember that live stock is the only true basis of economic and profitable farming. The more grain you grow, the more stock you can carry. The more stock you keep, the more fertilizer for your fields. Mixed farming is real farming, not speculating.

Study this table, which was prepared before the war. Only one country increased its cattle more than its people in the past ten years. And, in it (Australia) in 1914 there was a tremendous loss of live stock through an unprecedented drought—a fact which the table does not show. Do you need any stronger argument than this table that there is bound to be an increasing demand for beef? Add to this condition, the destruction of live stock of all kinds, breeding and young stock included, in the war zones. The war has merely hastened the meat shortage of the world. When it is over, the farmer with live stock will continue to profit in the world's markets, and, in addition to having helped feed our soldiers at the front, will be in a position to reap a further reward for having stayed with the live stock industry.

BEEF

SHEEP. Canadian farmers have been losing great opportunities in sheep raising and sheep feeding. Hundreds of thousands of sheep have been slaughtered to provide winter clothing for the soldiers of the different armies. Australia's losses, through drought in 1914, were very heavy. Canada has been importing frozen mutton from New Zealand. In view of these conditions, wool and mutton should prove very profitable for Canadian sheep raisers during the next few years.

SWINE. Through the indiscriminate sale of swine in the Canadian West in the past three months, the supply in 1915 promises to be little more than half of 1914. Add to this the fact that the British soldier is allowed ½ lb. of bacon per day, and that sausage is the principal meat food of the German soldier, and you will understand the outlook for the future. Those who stay steadily with swine, year in and year out, make money. Those who rush in and rush out, generally lose money. "Buy when others are selling, sell when others are buying," applies to live stock as well as to Wall Street stocks.

DAIRY. Milch cows increased in Canada from 2,408,877 in 1901 to 2,694,179 in 1911. This increase did not amount to 8%, and was less than one-quarter of the population increase of Canada. At the same time, the per capita consumption of milk by Canadians increased 30%. Is there any wonder we had to import 7,000,000 lbs. of butter from New Zealand?

The exports of Canadian cheese have been steadily declining for ten years. Look at the market prices today. Do they not suggest the advantage of increased production?

Through cow-testing, selection and better feeding, the average annual production per cow in Canada did increase from 3,850 lbs. per cow in 1901 to 3,805 lbs. in 1911, but this is only a beginning. Last year one cow in Canada produced 26,000 lbs.

The dairymen of Denmark who supply Great Britain with butter and bacon are not satisfied unless their herds average 10,000 lbs. per cow. Let Canadian dairymen work hard to increase the productiveness of the milch cow. Breed for milk. Test your cows. Save your calves. Select your milkers. Feed for yield. Read the Agricultural papers and Government reports and bulletins on dairying.

CONFERENCES

Now that you have attended the Conferences, or have read about them, get together and talk things over. Also write to the Publications Branch, Canadian Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, for bulletins and reports on live stock and dairying.

Stanley, commanding Armor Service Corps at Kensington Barracks, London, Eng., under date of March 8th, expressing thanks for the fruit.

—Mr. Wm. H. Kidd, a well known farmer of Elderslie, near Chesley, died very suddenly about one o'clock on Friday morning. He had been out spending the evening at the home of Mr. J. Oswald, and suddenly expired while sitting in a chair and fell to the floor. The deceased was about 58 years of age, and a brother of Collector Hugh Kidd.

—A grand exhibition of pictures in the new Paisley school April 7, 8, 9 and 10, open from 1 to 5 p.m. daily. The exhibit will comprise 350 subjects from all the principal schools of art, sculpture and architecture, including the very best reproductions of the masterpieces of different countries and periods. Purchasing orders taken for all pictures on exhibit. A selection such as this cannot be seen outside the great art galleries. Admission only 10c. A programme each afternoon for school children. Light refreshments for sale.

—Between now and May Day is the time for the annual clean-up. This little town could be wonderfully improved in appearance if every public officer were to see to it that the municipal property be properly furbished up this spring. There are some very much neglected spots in this vicinity. Our town hall and waterworks power house, which, if kept tidy and green during the year, might be an inspiration for private property holders. Every individual should take a pride in doing his share towards making the town a place of beauty.

—"Craigie," McArthur's Bookstore, for $1.25. Worth $1.25.

—A notable business change has been negotiated in town during the past week, Mackie & Sparrow, successors to W. H. McFarlane, selling out. Mr. Malcolm J. Campbell, a Paisley boy, who gained his first business experience behind the counters in this big store, is the new proprietor. "Mac" spent seven years in positions with large concerns in Brandon, Winnipeg and Chicago, so is thoroughly versed in the mercantile trade, and capable of handling the patronage of this old established Paisley store. He has a host of friends who will wish him every success in the venture. Mr. Mackie and family left on Saturday for Beamsville, while Mr. Sparrow is still in town.

THE LATE W. WINCH

Mr Washington Winch, a highly esteemed resident of Belhaven, passed away March 2nd after a very short illness. The deceased was born in Elderslie in 1864. Later the family removed to the farm at Belhaven, where he died. In 1886 he married Miss Lavina Morton, who with five sons and two daughters mourn the loss of a kind husband and loving father. The deceased was a devoted worker in the Keswick Christian church, and a never-ceasing worker in the Belhaven Sunday school, of which he was the founder and has acted as superintendent for twenty-five years. His faithful service and genial disposition will long be remembered by both old and young, as was shown by the beautiful floral offering. The funeral was very largely attended by relatives and friends. He was the second youngest of a family of seven, all being present at the funeral: Mrs Geo Shaw of Toronto, W H Winch of Owen Sound, Mrs Perry Morton of Belhaven, Mrs C P Morton of Newmarket, S Winch of Paisley, and Mrs C R Soules of Toronto.

THE FUR TRADE AND THE WAR

25,000 CANADIAN INDIANS MAY DIE OF STARVATION.

The Rich Companies Have Refused to Advance Supplies to Indians.

Following close upon the outbreak of the European war the Continental fur trade centres of Leipsic, London, Paris, and Petrograd closed their doors against incoming fur shipments; the fur market in Europe became a dead thing. And the North American Continent, ranking as it does second in the list of fur-producing continents, was of course, vitally affected, says the New York Outlook.

In Canada ninety per cent. of the fur taken comes from the region lying northward from the fifty-third parallel of latitude to the Arctic Ocean, and from the Alaskan boundary and the Pacific Ocean on the west to the shores of Hudson Bay and James Bay on the east. The most casual glance at the map of North America gives an idea of the immensity of the territory covered.

In 1670 the Hudson's Bay Company invaded this territory, and during the next hundred and fifty years established a string of fur posts from end to end of it. From this region, then, still largely a terra incognita of immeasurable vastness peopled by scattered bands of Indians, this company, through its chain of fur depots, wrung a harvest of wealth that for vastness of dividends paid on the initial investment has probably no equal in the history of the world.

About a hundred and fifty years after the invasion of the Hudson's Bay Company the powerful French firm of Revillon Freres entered into active competition in this field. In turn came independent trading companies, all of which now carry on the business of gathering in the furs produced in this area.

Stopped Indians' Supplies.

With the outbreak of the war all the companies, their market in Europe shut off, stopped buying furs. And the Hudson's Bay Company, on behalf of itself, Revillon Freres, and the independent trading companies, notified the Department of Indian Affairs of the Canadian Government that they would be unable to make the usual advance of supplies to the Indians, by which the Indians were in former years enabled to go into the wilderness and carry on the season's trapping.

For over two centuries it has been the practice of the fur post factors of northern Canada to advance supplies to the Indians trapping in their vicinity. This advance, known as "debt," was taken out of the fur catch brought in by the trappers the following spring. In good years a nice balance was left over for the Indian, and he and his family revelled in new blankets and gewgaws, became possessed of more guns and much powder and ball, and grew fat from well feeding. When bad years overtook the Indian hunter he was not able to pay all of last year's "debt"—was even forced to take out a new one. So that the Indian, eternally improvident, seldom secured independence from the furmen; nor did he ever lay anything away for a rainy day.

Robbed of a market for any furs he may have had on hand when the war broke out and with the customary "debt" now refused, some twenty-five thousand northern Canadian Indians now face a serious situation: many of them may starve. Of course they are in many ways to blame for this condition of affairs. But at the same time the real responsibility lies elsewhere—with the white man.

"God made the game and the fur-bearing animals for the Indian, and trade goods and money for the white man," an old Indian chief said, very sagely, to the writer recently; "and," he added plaintively, "they shouldn't be fixed, for when they do the Indian always gets the worst of it."

Worse Since Whites Came.

The situation could not have been more aptly summed up. Before the white man came the Indian lived successfully by what he gained from the chase. Then fur-gathering was merely a side line with him. With the establishing of fur posts by the white men the Indian began gradually to trap more and hunt less, depending on the proceeds from his fur which would buy white man's grub and thus make up the deficit caused from his neglecting the hunt.

In the old days an Indian, to buy one of the old-fashioned long-barreled rifles known as "trade guns," was required to pile up skins one upon the other till they reached in height from the butt to the end of the rifle barrel. At Fort Nelson, British Columbia, a place far in the interior, the following prices were in effect in October, 1910: Flour, 30 cents a pound; tea (common), $1; bacon, 50 cents; rolled oats, 50 cents; and sulphur matches, $2 per quarter gross. At Fort Murray, much nearer civilization, 1914 prices were: per pound, tea, $1; flour, 20 cents; sugar 25 cents.

Considering these prices, which are a very fair sample of prices charged to the Indians, in many parts of the north, it is to be doubted whether the Indian is as well off as a trapper for the white man as he would have been by remaining an independent hunter.

HOW THE FARMER CAN HELP.

Making the Best Use of the Land Under Production.

The Germans continue to murder and assassinate innocent British subjects, not only in war, but also at sea. Submarine attacks on noncombatants without warning are nothing more than cold-blooded assassination. While thousands of men are giving up their lives daily in Europe, the whole British Empire, outside of the Mother Country herself, a part of South Africa and an occasional section in India, remains at peace, at liberty to sow and to reap and to transact business as if there were no disturbing elements anywhere. Not only is this the case, but the country is invited to extend its markets, to benefit itself,—by any sacrifice? No, but by extra effort.

Everybody recognizes that farmers are the hardest-working class, as a class, in the community, their hours being longer and their duties exacting. They are no tasked to work either harder or longer, they are simply counselled to increase production by improved and tried methods, to be systematic in their business relations, and, above all, to see that the soil is adaptable and the seed they sow is the purest and best. In patriotism, in noble endeavor, and in the bearing of hardships, the farmer and the settler stand out pre-eminent. They are the pioneers and the creators of life. They are not alone the vertebrae, but the very blood of the country.

The Patriotism and Production campaign, promoted from Ottawa, has two aims in view, one to impress upon all and sundry the critical times in which we live, and the opportunity that is before us, and the other to encourage and urge, not so much the cultivation of more areas as making the greatest use of the land under production. This can only be done by adopting the best methods. That help in this direction may be forthcoming, a series of conferences are being held in different parts of the country, and a deal of literature circulated and supplied only for the asking.

Application, postage free, to the Publications Branch, Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, will bring a list of upwards of two hundred bulletins, pamphlets, reports and records of experiments, all containing valuable information on farming—on cultivation and fertilizing the soil, on the selection of seed, on breeding and rearing every kind of live stock, on the prevention, nature and curing of disease, and on kindred subjects. All have been written and prepared by experts, by learned professors and by men who have spent years in experimenting with a view to gaining additional knowledge and perfecting their judgment, so that they may be able to place before the farmers of Canada practical, absolutely feasible and proved beneficial ideas.

GOOD MARCHING.

Mons and the retreat to Paris proved that British infantry could march and fight with any soldiers, and most wars show some particularly good feat of endurance, such as the fine march of the 1st Essex in South Africa, for instance. It was one of the regiments that marched from Bloemfontein to Pretoria, on one occasion covering forty-two miles in twenty-one hours. Left behind at the Zand River to superintend the crossing of the baggage train, it worked for twenty-four hours and set out to catch up its division. One of the finest cavalry rides was that of General Drury-Lowe's brigade after Tel-el-Kebir. Sent forward to Cairo in order to seize it and prevent looting, the horsemen covered sixty-five miles across the desert, arriving so done-up that their horses could hardly stand.

A Market to Retain.

In 1914 Britain imported Canadian produce in excess of 1913 to the value of $4,352,000, and in excess of 1912, of $22,690,000. For the last quarter of 1914 the excess over the same period in the previous year was nine and a half millions. These figures surely furnish some idea of the necessity there is for further production. To retain the market, Canada must have the goods. To have the goods she must cultivate the best. It is this great and important doctrine that the Patriotism and Production campaign is instilling, and that the publications issued by the Department of Agriculture are intended to impress and further. Any of this literature can be had by sending a post-free application to the Publications Branch, Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, saying what is wanted. A list of upwards of two hundred publications from which to choose will be forward on request.

Spain is said to have more hunchbacks than any other country.

Western Farmers Meet Demands

Within the next few weeks the farmers in Canada will be engaged upon the work of seeding the greatest acreage which has ever been given over to the production of grain in the history of the Dominion. While statistics portraying the actual increase in area will not be given until the federal authorities at Ottawa compile in the late spring the reports from their correspondents on work done, the findings of investigations which have already been completed point clearly to the conclusion that the additions throughout the Western provinces, at least, will be very considerable in extent. Officials of the Canadian Northern recently finished a survey of fall plowing along the lines of that company in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The figures which were sent in, of course, deal with the C.N.R. only, but they may be taken as an indication of the manner in which the farmers west of the Great Lakes have responded to the call for a greater production of foodstuffs in Canada. Five hundred and thirty-nine agents contributed to the report in order that it would be thoroughly representative of the territory served.

Altogether, along the Canadian Northern lines in the prairie provinces the increase may be averaged at forty per cent. The figures give a total acreage plowed last fall of 6,181,370 acres. This is an increase of 1,766,104 acres over the preceding year. Figured at 21.38 bushels to the acre—the flat average of the yield in Western provinces in 1914 for wheat, oats, and barley—the grain yield from fall-plowed lands along the Canadian Northern in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, would be 132,157,619.58 bushels. On the yield basis of last year the increased acreage would produce 37,759,389.04 bushels. But 1914 was an off year for grain production in the West, and that average will probably be exceeded in 1915.

The largest acreage for any one station was reported from Star City, in the black loam district in Northern Saskatchewan. It was given as 110,000, and the increase over last year as 40 per cent. Naisberry, close to Star City, reported 75,000 acres. Melfort, near by on the same line, claimed an increase of 100 per cent. Rosthern reported an increase of 300 per cent. over last year. Duck Lake's 80,000 acres is an increase of 75 per cent. To the north, Hafford, on the new line connecting the cities of Prince Albert and North Battleford, reported 78,000 acres in area, 95 per cent. greater than in 1913. To the south, in Saskatchewan, Delisle, on the Saskatoon-Calgary line, reported 88,000 acres, which is an increase of 30 per cent. Marshall, on the main line toward the Alberta boundary, returned 50,000 acres. In Alberta the town of Hanna reported 40,000 acres, an increase of 20 per cent. Stettler, in the central portion of the province, gave 30,000, an increase of 20 per cent. Craigmyle, close to Calgary, reported 40,000 acres, and Delia, the next station, 47,000, which is an increase of 200 per cent. Two towns on the same line, closer to the Saskatchewan-Alberta line—Consul and Chinook—report 15,000 acres each. In the former the increase is given at 1,200 per cent., while at the latter place there was no fall plowing done in 1913.

Even in the older settled parts of the West, there are gratifying increases. At Morris, in Manitoba, the acreage is given at 30,000 and the increase 25 per cent. At Gladstone, there are 20,000 acres, which represent a 25 per cent. increase. At Spirling, in the Carman subdivision, the agent reports 40,000, which is an increase of 15 per cent. At Dunrea in the Hartney district the figures jump to 70,000, which represents an increase of 70 per cent. Kipling reports 75,000, an increase of 90 per cent. As these are the conspicuous returns only, it is apparent that Canada is doing her allotted part of the task which is at present confronting the Empire.

CULTIVATION OF CORN.

Tests in the Different Provinces From Which It Is Gathered.

The Agricultural Gazette for February is full of important matter relating to the cultivation of corn. "By the aid of science," the Gazette says, "great progress has been made in extending and improving the corn crop in Canada." In thirty years the yield has increased from a little over nine million bushels to nearly seventeen million. In 1893 the yield of fodder corn was 1,040,324 tons. Twenty years later, or in 1913, it was 9,016,300 tons. Increase and improvement were noticeable in almost every province. Relative to the argument sometimes advanced that Canada is situated too far north for the production of corn, Professor M. O. Malte, the Dominion Agrostologist, says that while there are districts in Canada where Indian corn could and should be grown to the greatest advantage, there are also thousands of square miles where profitable growing would be very difficult. After stating that the quality of the ensilage produced by a certain variety of corn should be the factor which should guide the farmer in his choice of seed, the Professor says that the experience gained by the Experimental Farms demonstrates the wisdom of increasing the acreage of early varieties rather than of depending on large yielding late sorts for the desired tonnage.

The magazine notes that of recent years the Seed Branch of the Department has given special attention to the corn crop, particularly to that grown for ensilage. All experiments and research indicate that the great need of ensilage growers is a supply of seed corn of strong vitality and of a variety and strain suited to the conditions under which it is to be grown. Reports are given of tests in the different provinces from which it is gathered that for Ontario the following seven varieties are best adapted:

Dents.

Wisconsin No. 7.
Golden Glow.
Whitecap Yellow Dent.
Bailey.

Flints.

Longfellow.
Compton's Early.
Salzer's North Dakota.

As for sweet corn, Deputy Minister Bondhouse states that the Golden Bantam has proved the best early variety and Stowell's Evergreen the best late variety.

Manitoba is not much given to corn growing, but the fodder favorites are the Longfellow, North western Dent and North Dakota Flint. Of the husking varieties the choices are Native or Squaw corn, Gehu Yellow Flint, Tree Press and Quebec or Canada Yellow, the last mentioned being a little later than the others. In Saskatchewan and Alberta the varieties favored are about the same as in Manitoba. In British Columbia the progress in corn-growing has been marked, Minnesota No. 13, North-Western Dent and Quebec No. 28 having so far given the best results. In New Brunswick and the Maritime Provinces generally New Brunswick Yellow, Canada Yellow and Squaw corn have proved the most valuable varieties.

CALLING ON AN ALLIGATOR.

A Traveller's Experience in Northern Australia.

The author of "By Flood and Field," a book of adventure in northern Australia, gives to one chapter of his narrative the title, "A Bad Time." A few paragraphs will show how well chosen the title is. He had "bushed," as they say in Australia; that is, he was lost in the bush, and was parched with thirst.

After what appeared to me hours of wandering, I came to a dense mangrove swamp, and not having the sense to keep out of it, I went straight on. At first I found it beautifully cool, but I soon became terrified by the gloomy, ominous silence of the scene. Of all the fear-producing, awesome places to be found on earth, surely a mangrove swamp is the most fearful. I waded through the soft mud, and toiled over greasy roots that projected some feet out of the mire, looking like coils of knotted serpents, or like the gnarled, interlaced fingers of giant hands thrust up in despair.

At times I sank to my knees in the ooze, and my legs and naked feet were wounded at every step by the shells embedded in the mud, and by the spike-like leaves of a peculiar mangrove that showed above the surface. Now sinking down through sheer exhaustion, now struggling on again in the gloom, at last I caught sight of a strip of blue—a ribbon of sky—that told me, half-crazed though I was, that at last the open land was near.

Clear of the mangroves, I crawled toward a depression that gave promise of the water for which I was famishing. Judge of my despair on reaching the bank when I found the water to be that of a tidal creek. With a cry of disappointment that bordered on despair, I collapsed, flinging my gun from me as I did so, fortunately in the direction of the mangroves. I remember a sensation as if falling an immense distance, then a bellow, a snap like the sound of a great steel trap closing, a rush of air like that caused by the arms of a windmill, and I found myself lying on my back in a bed of soft, evil-smelling mud.

As I lay, a splash attracted my attention, and I turned to see an immense alligator disappear round a bend in the creek. I had fallen down the steep bank and on the back of the alligator while he slept. Fortunately for me, the creature had made off in fear, and beyond a scratch across my forehead, from which blood flowed freely, caused doubtless by one of the monster's claws, I was none the worse for making its acquaintance.

PERSONAL POINTERS.

Interesting Gossip About Prominent People.

King Albert has dug in coalpits, stoked in steel foundries, and driven a passenger-train from Ostend to Brussels.

The Duke of Connaught was taught to play the military kettle drum by a man who fought as a private at Waterloo.

Lord Methuen, the new Governor of Malta, possesses among his many decorations a medal given to him by the Prussian Humane Society for pulling a would-be suicide out of a canal.

Earl Percy is said to be one of the two gentlemen writing despatches from the front under the pseudonym of "Eye-Witness." He once accomplished a notable feat in walking from Montreal to Ottawa, a distance of 116 miles, in three days for a wager.

Queen Wilhelmina of Holland is sometimes referred to as the queen with the finest complexion in Europe, but few people know that she has a special recipe for keeping her skin in perfect condition. Some time ago she adopted the plan from the Dutch Indies of taking lemon baths. Five or six lemons are squeezed into the bath, and various scents then added, including eau-de-Cologne, of which she is said to use a pint a day. The bath is highly invigorating, and, thanks to the Queen, has become very popular among Dutch society beauties.

Abdul Hamid, ex-Sultan of Turkey, used to go in fear of his life when he was ruler of the Ottoman Empire. In the Yildiz Kiosk, his principal palace, there were seven bedrooms in which he used to sleep, and these contained not ordinary beds, but large couches sloping at a considerable angle from the head-end downwards, so that the Sultan could sleep in a semi-upright position, and spring up at a moment's notice. No one knew in which of the seven rooms Abdul Hamid was going to sleep, for he changed his resting place every night. Along the main passage which led past many of these rooms was an ingenious arrangement for giving warning of the approach of anyone. The floor was composed of loose planks, so that merely to walk along it started a clanking sound which must invariably have awakened a light and nervous sleeper.

Sport in War.

Our soldiers, officers and privates alike, must have their sport in between their bouts of fighting, as there is no reason to be scandalized at a pack of hounds being sent to France to provide a run during off days. During the strenuous campaign in the Peninsula the Duke of Wellington always took a pack of hounds with him, and once when a retirement was necessary, he ordered his general to save his hounds whatever else had to be abandoned. In the South African War, too, our officers managed to get an occasional day's hunting with the Cape pack when opportunity offered; while when a famous regiment on the way out made a few hours' stay at Gibraltar, the Cape Hounds turned out for a run. Race-meetings were often organized, and then as now the men were never too tired for football, while when the foe was not about officers and men indulged in a little shooting. Even the German Crown Prince recently enjoyed a day with his partridges, and our officers followed his example.

Japan's Tommy Atkins.

Should the day ever arrive when the British Tommy Atkins fights side by side with the soldier of Japan, the greatest contrast between them will appear over the question of height. Five feet two inches is about the average height of the Japanese warrior, though the artillerymen are much taller, only picked men being enlisted into this branch of the Service. About three miles an hour is the rate at which the Jap soldier marches and he carries sixty-eight pounds of kit and clothing. He can march for tremendous stretches without food, and is quite the healthiest and hardiest soldier in the world, with the possible exception of our Indian troops.

"Catarrhozone" Prevents Bad Colds Strengthens Weak Irritable Throats

Employs Nature's Own Methods and is Invariably Successful.

Few will escape a cold this winter, but alas! many colds run into Catarrh. Neglected Catarrh is the straight gateway to consumption.

Catarrhozone is a germ-killer—destroys microbes that cause Catarrh.

It heals and soothes, relieves the cough, gives throat and lungs a chance, cleanses the nostrils, clears out the phlegm.

You feel better in an hour.

In a day you're greatly relieved, and on goes the curing of Catarrhozone till you're well.

No treatment so direct. Catarrhozone goes right to the spot—acts quickly, cures thoroughly catarrh, bronchitis and all throat affections.

"Nothing could kill a cold so fast as Catarrhozone," writes Amey E. Snelling, from St. Johns. "Last month I had a frightful cold in my head, suffered from itching nose, running eyes and torturing headache. Ten minutes with "Catarrhozone" Inhaler gave relief and in one hour I was well of my cold. Catarrhozone I consider a marvel."

Carry "Catarrhozone" Inhaler in your pocket or purse—take it to church—to the theatre—to work—use it in bed. It prevents and cures all manner of nose and throat troubles. Complete outfit, guaranteed $1.00; small size 50c.; sample size 25c.; at dealers everywhere.

SPRING IMPURITIES IN THE BLOOD

A Tonic Medicine is a Necessity at This Season

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People are at all year round tonic, blood-builder and nerve-restorer. But they are especially valuable in the spring when the system is loaded with impurities as a result of the indoors life of the winter months. There is no other season when the blood is so much in need of purifying and enriching, and every dose of these Pills helps to make new, rich, red blood. In the spring one feels weak and tired—Dr. Williams' Pink Pills develop the appetite, tone the stomach and aid weak digestion. It is in the spring that poisons in the blood find an outlet in disfiguring pimples, eruptions and boils—Dr. Williams Pink Pills speedily clear the skin because they go to the root of the trouble in the blood. In the spring anæmia, rheumatism, indigestion, neuralgia, erysipelas and many other troubes are most persistent because of poor, weak blood, and it is at this time when all nature takes on new life that the blood most seriously needs attention. Some people dose themselves with purgatives at this season, but these only further weaken themselves. A purgative merely gallops through the system, emptying the bowels, but it does not cure anything. On the other hand Dr. Williams' Pink Pills actually make new blood, which reaches every nerve and organ in the body, bringing new strength, new health and vigor to weak, easily tired men, women and children. Try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills this spring—they will not disappoint you.

You can get the health-renewing Pills through any medicine dealer or by mail post paid at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

FARM CROPS.

Results of Experiments at the Ontario Agricultural College.

By way of supplementing the Patriotism and Production movement the Ontario Department of Agriculture has issued Bulletin 228, "Farm Crops," prepared by Prof. C. A. Zavitz.

The reading of this bulletin should assist in a material improvement in the quality as well as the quantity of farm products of the Province.

It deals with experiments made in raising of each of the regular field crops, and of other important crops (chiefly for fodder) not now well known to many of our farmers.

These tests were conducted at the Ontario Agricultural Farm, Guelph, under the direction of the author, the well-known cerealist and general experimenter in agronomics, and valuable advice is given by him regarding the possible increase of farm produce, the rotation of crops, etc. The influence of seed selection and of hybridization in relation to the improvement of both quality and the production of field crops, sometimes resulting in new popular varieties, is stated in a most clear and interesting manner, and is full of encouragement for those who would like to engage in such experiments.

Valuable information is offered as to best combinations for mixed grains, and the treatment of seed grain for smut. Considerable space is also given to discussing alfalfa as a pasture and fodder crop, and to the making of both annual and permanent pastures.

Prof. Zavitz urges that special attention be given to raising seed for field crops in Ontario, as most of such seed up to the present time has been imported from European countries now at war.

The writer of this bulletin gives four very practical rules for producing satisfactory field crops:

1. Raise only such crops as are likely to meet the demand.
2. Select good plump seed which has been tested for vitality.
3. Give the land early and thorough cultivation.
4. Sow all crops at the proper time and according to right methods.

This bulletin may be procured free of charge by applying to the Ontario Department of Agriculture, Toronto.

THE BEST MEDICINE FOR LITTLE ONES

Baby's Own Tablets are the best medicine in the world for little ones. They are absolutely safe and never fail to regulate the stomach and bowels, break up colds and simple fevers, expel worms and make teething easy. Concerning them Mrs. D. S. Bernhardt, Port Dalhousie, Ont., writes: "I have been using Baby's Own Tablets for my baby and would not be without them." The Tablets are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Ready money is seldom ready when you want to borrow some.

ANIMALS JOIN ARMY.

Dogs and Goats Are Food of the Soldiers.

A Belgian soldier talked to a Paris correspondent of the New York Sun of the animals that had "joined" the Belgian army as it marched through the open country. His face softened as he related some of his experiences.

"We managed to collect stray dogs all the way," he said. At one time there were fully a dozen of all species. Some stayed with us throughout the march, but others came and went. One small white, shaggy dog became so much in love with the life that she never deserted, and is probably on duty now, if she has not been killed by a stray bullet.

"A young little thing, she learned to march when our captain called, 'En avant,' and when he called, 'Halte!' she came to a dead stop, and would not budge until another order was given. She ran among all the soldiers, rubbing against them and caressing them, and we would do anything for her. She loved corned beef, and she got some every day, even though one of us had to go without in order to give it to her.

"Two goats suddenly appeared among us one day, and they supplied us with milk for a long time. They liked the roving life. They nibbled all day; they did not mind the guns, and they got along well with the dogs. When there was no more milk, we had to leave them at a farm, for looking after and feeding them was too much of a task.

"The help that does have given us is incalculable. Three of them drag a rapid-fire gun, and their intelligence is almost human. They get no rest, for they are on active duty day and night without being unharnessed. When released, they fly over the fields like a child at play; they bark and snap at each other, for they no doubt feel that they have earned a holiday. At least, that was the way at first, but now they are too worn out for anything save a bite of food and sleep. The number of dogs that have lost their lives must be very great."

WHY DODD'S KIDNEY PILLS ARE A HOUSEHOLD REMEDY.

People Have Learned From Long Experience that by Curing the Kidney Ills They Benefit the Entire Body.

Spry Harbor, Halifax Co., N.S., March 22 (Special).—"I have taken a couple of boxes of Dodd's Kidney Pills and have received great benefit from them. They are certainly a fine pill for anyone suffering from Kidney trouble." So says Mrs. Alex. E. Nilchey, and she speaks the sentiments of a large number of the women of Nova Scotia.

Dodd's Kidney Pills have so long been in general use that they are recognized as the standard remedy for Kidney troubles. They have become a family medicine in thousands of homes. People have learned from long experience that if they cure their minor Kidney ills with Dodd's Kidney Pills they need not fear those more terrible developments such as Bright's Disease, Diabetes, Dropsy and Rheumatism. They have also learned that when the Kidneys are cured by Dodd's Kidney Pills the whole body benefits. For cured Kidneys mean pure blood, and pure blood is the foundation of all health. That's why Dodd's Kidney Pills are universally popular.

A Billion Wheat Deficit.

According to reliable statistics there are tied up at the present time about two billion bushels of wheat, the production of the countries at war. This is in the vicinity of half the world's total production of wheat. A recognized authority argues that granting that the warring nations produce a one-half crop in the coming year, a deficit of one billion bushels will still be shown. The three countries upon which the filling of this deficit of one billion bushels will rest are Canada, the United States and Argentina. The combined output of these three countries is only 1,249,000,000; their exportable surplus would, of course, be much less, so it can easily be seen that the question is not one to be easily solved, and it behooves Canada to increase her production as much as she possibly can, for when the war is over and trade begins to re-establish itself and the nations undergo a process of rehabilitation, the demand for all breadstuffs must be overwhelming and such a shortage can only be called such because the wind comes sometimes from the north, the leaves have gone from the trees and the grass has turned brown; a spring that might early in February and lasts until June, when March isn't really March, and April pillows its head in the lap of May; a summer warranted to ripen anything; and a fall whose faintly frost-bued days enwrapped in the misty amiess of the slow-going sun, never fail to caress and kiss the robes of Christmas. St. Peter found a man in chains within the pearly gates. But wonderful to relate he learned that the man was from Arkansas—and had to be chained to keep him from going back.

We are hoping the low price of cotton may be a blessing in disguise. Also it will be a blessing if it leads the farmers to cut their cotton crop in half at least and turn these fertile hills and valleys that only need to be "tickled" to bring forth an hundred-fold—to raising wheat and corn, hay and hogs, cattle and sheep. We can raise anything and everything down here, except possibly Republicans. They are mostly imported from above the Mason and Dixon line.

It is not an easy matter to satisfy all the members of the family at meal time, as every housewife knows.

And when the husband can't eat ordinary food without causing trouble, the food question becomes doubly annoying.

A lady writes:

"My husband's health was poor, he had no appetite for anything I could get for him, it seemed.

"He suffered severely with stomach trouble, was hardly able to work, was taking medicine continually, and as soon as he would feel better would go to work again, only to give up in a few weeks.

"One day, seeing an advertisement about Grape-Nuts, I got some and he tried it for breakfast the next morning.

"We all thought it was pretty good although we had no idea of using it regularly. But when my husband came home at night he asked for Grape-Nuts.

"It was the same next day and I had to get it right along, because when we would get to the table the question, 'Have you any Grape-nuts' was a regular thing. So I began to buy it by the dozen pkgs.

"My husband's health began to improve right along. I sometimes felt offended when I'd make something I thought he would like for a change, and still hear the same old question, 'Have you any Grape-Nuts?'

"He got so well that for the last two years he has hardly lost a day from his work, and we are still using Grape-Nuts."

Every Stiff Joint Limbered, Rheumatism Cured!

That Old Family Remedy "Nervilina" is guaranteed for the Worst Cases.

CURES NEURALGIA, BACKACHE, LUMBAGO.

Rheumatism to-day is unnecessary. It is so well understood and so readily curable that every day we have reports of old chronics being freed of their tormenter.

"I can speak confidently of the Nervilina treatment, for the simple reason that it cured me," writes Albert B. Cornelius, from Kingston. "You can't imagine how stiff and lame and sore I was. Nights at a time I couldn't sleep well. I followed the Nervilina directions carefully—had it rubbed into the sore regions four or five times every day. Every rubbing helped to reduce the pain. The swelling went down. I got a fair measure of relief in a week. I also took two Perrozone Tablets with my meals. They increased my appetite and spirits, purified my blood and toned up my system generally.

"I am as well to-day as a man could be—in perfect good health. I give Nervilina all the credit."

A large family size bottle of Nervilina costs only 50c., or the trial size 25c., and is useful in a hundred ills in the family. Whether it's toothache, earache, headache, neuralgia, lame back or a cold, Nervilina will cure just as readily as it will cure rheumatism. For family use nothing equals Nervilina.

Smuts and Rusts of Grain Crops.

It is estimated that the losses sustained from smuts in Ontario grain crops amount to $2,720,000 annually, about two-thirds of which occur in oats, wheat being the next greatest sufferer. To cope with this danger Bulletin 229, entitled "Smuts and Rusts of Grain Crops," prepared by J. E. Howitt and R. E. Stone, has been issued by the Ontario Department of Agriculture, for free distribution to those who may apply for it. This very practical bulletin goes fully into the cause and cure of smuts and rusts, and gives a number of ways of treating seed grain in order to avoid or lessen injury to grain crops from these causes. Practical farmers will find it as a handy reference regarding losses from these two common grain troubles.

The Seed Catalogue.

Although it has been made the butt
Of ponderous jests for countless ages,
I thrill with pleasure as I cut
Its simply fascinating pages,
My heart with ecstasy dilates
As I peruse the glowing labels
Inscribed upon the colored plates
Of pumpkins, big as dining tables.

I see tomatoes, huge and red,
My fancy all aflame, I dwell on
A Brobdignagian cabbage head
Or a titanic watermelon.
And as the stirring text I read
I long for Spring and time for sowing,
That I may buy and plant the seed,
And sit and watch these marvels growing.

It simply can't be done, I know,
Though kindest skies may bend above them;
With sun and rain, the things I grow,
Will not look like the pictures of them.
The pumpkins will be soft and small,
The melons, though I tend and pet them,
Will die; the beans won't grow at all
Because the early worms will get them.

But as a story-loving youth
Extracts no end of solid pleasure
From tales depending not on truth,
But on romantic hunts for treasure,
This catalogue I read to-day
With rapture, if without conviction;
No matter what the seedfers say
It is my favorite work of fiction.

Death Nearly Claimed New Brunswick Lady

Was Restored to Her Anxious Family When Hope Had Gone.

St. John, N.B., Dec. 15th.—At one time it was feared that Mrs. J. Grant, of 3 White St. would succumb to the deadly ravages of advanced kidney trouble. "My first attacks of backaches and kidney trouble began years ago. For six years that dull gnawing pain has been present. When I exerted myself it was terribly intensified. If I caught cold the pain was unendurable. I used most everything, but nothing gave that certain grateful relief that came from Dr. Hamilton's Pills of Mandrake and Butternut. Instead of being bowed down with pain, to-day I am strong, enjoy splendid appetite, sleep soundly. Lost properties have been instilled into my blood—cheeks are rosy with color, and I thank that day that I heard of so grand a medicine as Dr Hamilton's Pills."

Every woman should use these pills regularly, because good health pays, and it's good, vigorous health that comes to all who use Dr Hamilton's Mandrake and Butternut Pills.

The Paisley Advocate

PAISLEY, APRIL 1st, 1915

—In reply to a question in the House of Commons, Hon Mr Hazen said that the cost of operating the Canadian naval fleet on a war basis would be as follows: The Niobe, $626,125 per annum; Rainbow, $366,450; and two submarines $170,075—a total of $1,262,650 per year.

—Each succeeding day it looks more like drastic action by the British Parliament to suppress the drink traffic. "If we are to settle with German militarism," said Hon. David Lloyd-George to a deputation of shipbuilders who asked that the sale of liquor be prohibited during the war period, "we must first of all settle with drink."

—A bill introduced in the Legislature by Hon Mr Hanna, Provincial Secretary, proposes to amend the Ontario Liquor License Act. Following is a summary of the provisions: Appoint a commission of five men to administer the liquor law in every section of the Province, pay them adequate salaries and demand that they give all their time to the work. Commission to have wide powers such as are given to the judicial license boards in England. Remove the whole question entirely from the realm of politics. Soldiers in uniform will not be permitted to buy either over the bar or in bottles in the shops. Close the shops at seven o'clock every evening. Close the bars and shops on Labor Day. Give the commission power to regulate the hours of sale in different sections of the Province, as they deem best for the locality in question. Increase the minimum fine for illicit selling from $100 to $300. Remove the option of those administering the law in the case of a second offence, and make it imperative on the authorities to send the offenders to jail for four months. Failure to obey regulations laid down by the commission to result in loss of license with consent of the Government of the day.

—There are columns and pages of Canadian party papers devoted to attack and defence of the army contract scandals these days. The party patronage system is again found to be very defective as a national business system. The Government endeavors to reward its supporters and punish its opponents by handing out all the "fat takes" to the faithful members of the party that put them in power. "To the victors belong the spoils." Very few manufacturers of the opposite political stripe are, under this system, given contracts direct, although it undoubtedly would be to the better interests of the business of the nation if tenders were received from all without regard to political allegiance. Men with the party "pull" are placed in authority on contract work, making plans and specifications that are imperfect and inadequate, while unprincipled manufacturers furnish material and supplies that are not up to requirements. Grafters get in as go-betweens, and all wax suddenly rich at the expense of the country. These things are all brought to the surface by investigation, but somehow the guilt is whitewashed over and nothing more is heard of it except as election campaign material. The Ottawa Citizen (Conservative) does not exaggerate the corrupt condition when it says, in discussing the army scandals, that "there is a maggot eating at the heart of Canada's national life." The overthrow of one political party and the return to power of another will not remedy the evil, as the patronage would still be dispensed in the same manner, only by different hands. What we need is an effectual elimination of the spoils system from our political constitution.

—We have all noted with some anxiety that Japan is pressing certain demands upon China, and even sending armed forces into the latter country to enforce the claims. The nature of the demands is not understood, so the important statement made by Mr. Yada, Consul General for Canada, at a Canadian Club luncheon in St Thomas, will be of general interest. Mr. Yada outlined the policy of Japan in the far east, both in regard to China and Germany. He said Japan stood for the "open door" in China and the Far East. Germany was the only nation which had objected to her policy. Not only was Japan standing by the British alliance in fighting Germany in the east but was protecting herself from German ambition. Germany was at present intriguing as she did in Turkey, and for this reason they had been compelled to act promptly in dealing with China. The principle of the "open door" and "equal opportunity among foreign nations in China," he described as the fixed policy of the Empire of Japan. It was the foundation of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. Japan had no territorial ambition in China, nor did she want in the least to interfere or violate any right or interests of other powers in China. He pointed out that Japan had abided by the treaty obligations of the alliance with Great Britain and promptly responded by attacking German colonies in China, while she had helped clear the Pacific and protected the commerce of the allies and the Canadian Pacific coast from bombardment. In this Japan had consistently carried out the treaty. "But, in addition to all this," said Mr. Yada, "it should be realized that Japan has also an obligation to herself in the safe-guarding her own interests, as well as those of other powers in the Far East. In order to do this it is necessary to look ahead and protect herself from future German intrigue when the present war has ended. "Japan has always stood for the principle of China and the 'open door.' She has no hostility to the policies fairly conceived and carried out, of other nations. She has on the other hand always maintained a sense of right and justice regarding such matters, and all nations with exception of Germany have been satisfied with her attitude. Germany, on the other hand, has maintained a selfish dual ambition for trade extension and acquisition of exclusive markets in the far east. She has sought to acquire colonies about which she could build a preferential wall open to herself alone. Kiao-Chau is an instance which Germany gained by force and fraudulent methods from China. It must also be realized that China is powerless to protect herself and her people from the most sinister and clever German intrigues and propoganda even now carried on in that country by German emissaries, who stop at nothing to carry out their ends, to misrepresent Japan and other Allies in that country as enemies of China, and representing that Germany is the only true friend of that country; in fact attempting to repeat her only too successful intrigues as we know in Turkey. For this reason Japan finds it necessary to deal promptly with the Chinese Government, so as to check at the outset the pernicious German policy in this direction, or, if not checked now, Germany threatens to become a menace to the peace of the far east, as she was before the present war."

From a Paisley Soldier Boy in British Training Camp

Mr and Mrs T H George received on Monday the following letter from their son who is with part of the Second Canadian Contingent at Shorncliffe, Eng.:

DEAR FOLKS—I guess I should have written sooner, but everything is strange here and I have been spending my spare time looking around. This place is a military camp about 8 miles south of Dover on the English channel, and about 2 miles from Folkstone. You can find it on almost any English map, I think. This part of the country is practically all town along the coast. We left Winnipeg just a month ago and went to Halifax, where we lay from Saturday night until Monday morning. Then we got on the Vaterland, a White Star boat. We lay in the harbor until Tuesday morning, then started for England, but had no idea where we were going. We sailed away southeast off New York, then headed straight for Gibraltar for quite a distance before we started for England. The other transports were the Megantic of the White Star line, and the Missanabi, a C P R liner. Our escorts were three British cruisers, the Hawke, the Vivid and another of which I forget the name. A week from the following Wednesday the cruisers warned our crews as to submarines and told each transport to look out for itself and try to make Queenstown. Now you should have seen how they put coal into the fire hold. A party of soldiers were told off to keep coal to the firemen and they succeeded in getting 16 knots out of the Vaterland. The Megantic made 22 knots, and we all got into Queenstown by Thursday morning. We were last in. It was reported that we had been sunk, and I guess we weren't far from it at that. We were in Queenstown until Saturday night at 5 o'clock. Then we started for Liverpool, but never got there. We were accompanied by the torpedo boats Lennox and Lance and three torpedo destroyers. They made a little scared and beat it into Bristol, but the Megantic went to Liverpool. You should see the torpedo boats and the destroyers travel. They go from 28 to 32 knots and just keep circling around us. You would think they would upset, but they never quiver. Five hours after we passed Cardiff, Wales, a British collier was torpedoed by a submarine and the Lennox and the Lance picked up the crew. So you see we would have gotten it only the enemy were afraid of British torpedo boats. We landed at Arden about 30 miles from Bristol, and were run across to here that afternoon. The train made 60 miles an hour. We passed London after dark and there were very few lights lit there. I forgot to say that after we had been three days at sea we didn't even light a match on deck after dark. We didn't even show the red and green side lights on the boats, so it was pretty dark all the way except in the daytime. It was foggy, too, but the captain said it was the quietest ocean he had ever crossed on.

It is spring over here. They have their cabbages and all that stuff set out and are hoeing weeds. It appears all farm work is being done here by the old men, as the young men are all in the army. Any man who doesn't volunteer over here might as well get out, as the people would make life unbearable for him. The weather is a lot damper over here and it still gives us an odd skiff of snow. We are right on the banks of the English channel and on clear days can see the coast of France. They say that when the wind was favorable last fall they could hear the cannon. We are training hard here now. The country is very hilly and the roads, which are all paved, don't go in rods without a twist. Well, I guess I will close and write again soon. Let me know how everything is over there. I received your letter from Winnipeg since I came here. My address is: Pte. T H George, No. 488, "B" Co. 33rd Battalion, C.E.F., Shorncliffe Camp, Kent Co., England.

AFRAID SHE WAS DYING

Suffered Terribly Until She Took "Fruit-a-tives"

ST. JEAN DE MATHA, JAN. 27th, 1914.

"After suffering for a long time with Dyspepsia, I have been cured by "Fruit-a-tives". I suffered so much that I would not dare eat for I was afraid of dying. Five years ago, I received samples of "Fruit-a-tives"; I did not wish to try them for I had little confidence in them but, seeing my husband's anxiety, I decided to do so and at once I felt relief. Then I sent for three boxes and I kept improving until I was cured. While sick, I lost several pounds, but after taking "Fruit-a-tives", I quickly regained what I had lost. Now I eat, sleep and digest well—in a word, I am completely cured, thanks to "Fruit-a-tives".

From Arkansas

The author of "Craigie," the new story that brings Bruce county into literature, pens the following very interesting epistle for readers of THE ADVOCATE. We would advise the writer, however, that there will be no general response to her invitation to "come down" to the fair state of Arkansas. Bruce pioneer yeomen have opened extensive tracts of western U. S. land, and more extensive stretches of our own northwest. Several score of us may be found along the southern Pacific coast, but mighty few are found located in the middle south, for although that region may offer an attractive climate, there is lacking the "all whiteness" of the people that Bruceites have grown up in They prefer the rigors of Canadian winter and our clean society to the balminess of the south with its admixture in "shade" of skin and character. To be sure, Arkansas may be improved since last Bruce heard from there, but up to date the view is about as we state above Cotton, the chief farmers' crop in Arkansas, is the product hardest hit by the European war conditions. The letter gives one a fair idea of the conditions in Arkansas, also of the author's versatility and style of writing. Read the letter and then get a copy of "Craigie," the "gripping story" of Bruce county and its well known local characters.

To the Editor of THE ADVOCATE—

We have our own troubles, and our troubles are largely up with our troubles. Truly these troublous times are teaching us the truth of the words, "For none of us liveth to himself and no man dieth to himself.' We read the papers continually, morning, noon and night. Never were papers so impatiently waited for, nor so intensely read. One glance at the headlines, and good or bad, the tension relaxes; one's breath comes easier—things might have been so much worse! You would suppose that our insulated position and non-belligerency would shield us from all trouble, but we find we are touched both in heart and the pocket.

We have often indulged in the phrase "Cotton is king!" We believed it, but now with our market gone we feel that its kingliness has departed. It is as fleecy, and white and desirable as ever—but we can't sell it, and can't eat it. The south has received a solar plexus blow, and is still gasping for breath. However, our newspapers, our farm demonstrators and our good common sense are crying out "Diversify; Diversify!" But absorbing lies always been the easiest job in the world. It is hard for a great people who have for decade on decade, and century on century, hoed and picked and sold cotton, to put their trust in anything else. Of course in the years gone by we have had a touch here and there of drouth or dampness, the ravages of the boll-weevil, or the onslaught of the army worm; but this European cataclysm has put a "crimp" in cotton for ever and for ever. So our leaders are acclaiming "Great is Arkansas!" "Sow what you eat!" "Let Arkansas feed herself!" And why not? Here is a Garden of Eden where it comes to climate and soil—a winter that can only be called such because the wind comes sometimes from the north, the leaves have gone from the trees and the grass has turned brown; a spring that begins early in February and lasts until June, when March isn't really March, and April pillows its head in the lap of May; a summer warranted to ripen anything; and a fall whose faintly frost-tued days encapped in the misty smiles of the slow-going sun, never fail to caress and kiss the robes of Christmas. St. Peter found a man in chains within the pearly gates. He wondered greatly until he learned that the man was from Arkansas—and had to be chained to keep him from going back.

We are hoping the low price of cotton may be a blessing in disguise. And it will be a blessing if it leads the farmers to cut their cotton crop in half at least, and turn these fertile hills and valleys—that only need to be "tickled" to bring forth an hundred-fold—to raising wheat and corn, hay and hogs, cattle and sheep. We can raise anything and everything down here, except possibly Republicans. They are mostly imported from above the Mason and Dixon line. To the small planter, and the big planter, a bale of cotton represented so much cash. Cotton buyers were on every corner ready to meet every wagon laden with the fleecy staple. But wheat—who ever heard of a wheat buyer? So we grow cotton—so much cotton for our own good. There is something economically wrong when you meet farmers leaving town with such things as bales of pressed hay, canned vegetables and cotton-seed. Let the hard times induce our farmers to change all that, and to sow and grow and can what they eat, the dawn of an agricultural millenium would quickly appear.

Another great drawback to the development of this great state consists in the immense holdings of lumber companies, in many cases thousands upon thousands of acres. We have too many large plantations of twenty or thirty thousand acres, and such farms are a hindrance, not a help. Of course most of the plantations are of more reasonable size, and many farms are very small especially near our cities. Better is it to "make every rood of ground maintains its max," as you have it in Ontario, with a school house every five miles or so, and an independent farmer on every two or three hundred acres. But the greatest drawback of all here, as it is everywhere, is credit. Usually the small farmer works his few rented acres on "shares". The boss supplies seed cotton and "carries" the renter and his family at the plantation store where prices are oft-times extortionately high. It is not pecunage, oh, no! But it acts like it, and sometimes although there is nothing tying the man to that particular plantation, one can almost by watching the "boss" fatten and the renter shrivel, hear the rattle of the chains. By way of illustration let me tell you the story of Jim. Jim was a good hard-working, self-respecting negro working fifty acres, rented from a wealthy planter. Finally it dawned on Jim that he had little or nothing to show for many years' hard work. He gave up the lease. Soon the planter had a chance to sell the place. The stranger was at the depot ready to board the train that was almost due, and he had not signed up. The planter despaired of making the sale until he saw Jim coming up.

"Here, Jim, come and tell this gentleman what sort of crops that piece of yours could raise."

Jim was ready, willing and proud to be asked.

"How many bushels sweet potatoes?"

"One hundred and fifty, sah."

"How much corn?"

"Sixty, sah."

"How much cotton?"

"Two bales to the acre, jes' as fine cotton as I ever did see!"

The stranger, much impressed, took out his fountain pen. The planter spread out the deed.

"Yes, sah!" said Jim enthusiastically. "Dat am no better land to be found den what dat is, and no better crops raised dan what I raise—till de 'ducks came!"

"All aboard!" called the conductor.

The stranger paused, put up his pen and seized his grip. The planter and Jim watched the stranger climb on board and the train pull out.

"Now, Jim," said the planter, turning on his trusted confederate, "what in the world did you mean by that?"

"Well, sah, boss, it's jes' like I'm tellin' you! When I sell de cotton you want yo' money for de seed, you 'duck for dat; fat mule you loan me, wut up an' died, you 'duck for dat; fur all de bacon an' co'n meal an' lasses at de store, you 'duck for dat. Now, sir, boss, dey wan't nuthin' left when de ducks came!"

(The only thing amiss with that story is the idea of a planter ever wanting to sell any land—Arkansas land.)

And so I say, given a farmer such as you have, who knows how to work and save, and a few acres of Arkansas land and Arkansas weather—listen, and you can hear the honk, honk of his automobile coming down the pike. De 'ducks sing a dreary tune, but the honk, honk of an automobile sings of downright prosperity when a farmer presses the bulb. Arkansas is the coming state of the Union. Arkansas has suffered much undesirable notoriety from the stories written by a certain clever fellow—"who needed the money and that was the easiest manner of getting it." In consequence Arkansas is bounded after this fashion: "Missouri lies about Arkansas on the north, Tennessee lies about Arkansas on the east, Louisiana and Texas lie about Arkansas on the south, Oklahoma lies about Arkansas on the west; in fact, all the states lie about Arkansas." We have been written up as "The land of the big red apple and the little read bible," but one of our silver-tongued orators declares that we are "The land of the big red apple, the little red hen and the well read bible." Sure, he's right! We've just passed a state-wide prohibition bill, a minimum wage bill for women, and have a drastic child labor law.

Come down and see us. You'll come back again—to stay.

Little Rock, Ark.

THE LATE DR. CROW

The aptitude of the Master's declaration that "the Son of Man cometh as a thief in the night" was brought home with startling suddenness to the residents of this town when it became known that early Tuesday morning that our friend and townsman, Dr. Crow, had passed away about seven o'clock. The deceased was in his 47th year, had been in splendid health up to a few days ago when he was seized with an attack of lagrippe causing an oedima of the larynx, which caused his sudden death on the date mentioned above. Dr. Crow was born in Arran Tp. in the year 1868 and received his education in Hamilton Collegiate Institute. After spending two years in the loan conveyancing business in Tara, he decided to enter the dental profession and was a graduate of the Toronto Dental College. He first opened an office in Tara, but in 1894 he removed to Chesley where he had since reunained and enjoyed a large practice. Being genial and offhanded Dr. Crow's friends were not confined to the town, but were numbered all over the country. He was progressive in his ideas, took a very active interest in everything that pertained to the town's, as well as the agricultural welfare, and the citizens showed their appreciation of his enterprise by electing his trustee in 1896 and three years later was appointed chairman of the School Board. In 1902 municipal honors were again conferred on him by electing him reeve, a position he held for three years. He then retired for three years, and in 1907 at the citizens' urgent request he came back and was again elected as the town's representative to the County Council. He filled this position to the end of 1910, the last year of which he was elected Warden. The subject of our sketch took a deep interest in things agricultural and to the doctor's credit must be placed the high standing of the Chesley Agricultural Society, and in this capacity honors were conferred on him by appointing him Vice-President for 1912 and President for 1913 and 1914 of the Provincial Fall Fairs Association. In November, 1914, he received the nomination of the Liberals of Centre Bruce for the local house but on account of a business pressure he was forced to decline it. He was also president of the Chesley Musical Society Band. He was prominent in everything which was done for the encouragement and advancement of the town. Dr. Crow was an enthusiastic curler and bowler and will be greatly missed in these sports. Early this year he was appointed magistrate for the District by the Ontario government. He was married on Dec. 28, 1904, to Miss Nellie McArthur, who, with her son Archie, survives him. His mother, Mrs. Crow, in Tara, and two brothers, Archie and James, also numerous degrees of kin and brother. In religion the Dr. was a Presbyterian, and his pastor, Rev. Mr. Hillis, will officiate at his funeral service which will be held to-day at 4 p.m. To Mrs. Crow and her son, as well as his mother and brothers, we extend the sympathy of the entire community in the passing away of one of Chesley's foremost citizens.—Enterprise.

—Nelson Hay, a member of the firm of Hay Brothers, grain merchants at Listowel, died at Battle Creek sanitarium on Sunday. The deceased was 41 years of age. He was born in Listowel, was mayor of the town for some time, and was one of the big men of Perth county.

MERCHANTS WHO HARM THEIR TOWN

A recent address on advertising by a recognized authority in one of the South-western States contained a statement which is worth reproducing here, as well as elsewhere. This is the paragraph:

"There are two kinds of merchants who hold back the development of a town. One does not advertise at all, the other advertises untruthfully. The merchant who advertises judiciously takes no more chance than he takes when he walks down to his store in the morning. Advertising is not a chance, it is an essential part of business.

"Marshall Field and Co., of Chicago, does an annual business of $10,000,000. Three per cent of this amount is spent in advertising. Some of the department stores in New York City spend six per cent. of their total sales in advertising. The Procter & Gamble Co. buys more than $200,000 worth of advertising a year in the Saturday Evening Post to sell 5c cakes of soap. Other advertisers advertise according to similar methods, to an equal extent. This advertising is not an expense, but is a means of increasing business.

Advertising with an honest line of goods and courteous treatment is the remedy for preventing the encroachment of the large chain of stores and mail order houses on the small city and town trade. Make everything about a business up to-date, make the advertising campaign lasting, earnest and honest and there is no doubt as to the success of the business."

—A good roads measure introduced in the Legislature by Hon F S MacDiarmid, Minister of Public Works, proposes to increase the contribution for county roads construction from 33 1-3 to 40 per cent, also to contribute 20 per cent to the cost of maintenance of county roads. Townships are to be encouraged to appoint highway commissioners. Where the municipal councils employ these commissioners to expend the money on roads raised by municipal taxation the Government will grant 25 per cent of the cost of the salaries of such commissioners, up to $600. The bill is not to come into effect until 1916.

—Kincardine Reporter: It looks as if there would be a Dominion election shortly. The question as to who will run in North Bruce against Col. Hugh Clark, M.P., is a live one. Well, if we had our choice we would say that Mr. John Tolmie, ex-M.P., is the man who would make the best run for the Liberals. True, his health is not what it once was, but he could stay at home and poll a big enough vote to win. Other names mentioned are Mr. A. P. Mewburney, ex-Warden of Bruce; Mr. A. McCantell, Warden of Bruce, Mr. Gid. Kastner and Mr. Sam. Parke, of Wiarton. All are well known in Liberal ranks. The name of Mr. R. Roy Bayles, of Port Elgin, might also be added to these. Many would like to see Mr. C. M. Bowman, M.P.P., run, but he is needed in the local legislature and is positively not in the field for the nomination. One more we say that John Tolmie is the man if his health would permit him to enter the field. If not, then any of the others mentioned would put up a good fight and no doubt redeem North Bruce.

—The Lions Head News last week gave the following account of an almost fatal goring: Last Wednesday William Warder, while taking his bull out to water was tossed by a loop of the rope getting about his head and was thrown to the ground. The animal then became enraged and although deterred charged him and mangled him badly. He managed while prostrate to release the snap from the bull's nose and his little boy and the dog then worried it so as to draw its attention away. Mr. Warder was helped into the house and Dr. Roy Harking was soon sent for. Two ribs were broken and his body and face badly bruised.

The Darkest Hour;

Or, The Hope That Still Lived.

CHAPTER XVI.—(Continued).

"What is the whole truth?" Mr. Wimpole Sturgess asked the question in a quietly grave tone, with his clear eyes and kindly mien fearless eyes of Brian, and Brian answered them unhesitatingly.

"The whole truth is that she loved me and loves me still with her whole heart, and that her whole happiness lay in our love, in our hope of marriage, and in the good work we were striving to do together. She was doing too much of that work, doing so much that she was making herself seriously ill, and yet she was so happy in it that all my pleading could not make her slacken it and take rest. After our marriage, which was to have been in a fortnight from now, I was going to take her away and force her to take rest until she recovered her roses and her radiant health. But that is beside the point. The point is the sudden fear on the night of the day when I came back to my work here, another home in desperate need. Lady Dare told, and said truly—for I know more of this than I am free to tell even you—that a certain unhappy secret which poisons her life had become known to a mysterious and dangerous person, whose silence concerning it could only be bought at the cost of the entire leaving me and renewing her engagement with Lord Southport. I know enough of the sad affair to be perfectly sure that this is true. And so, heartbroken, she agreed, for her mother's sake, to part from me, sacrificing her love and mine and the heavenly happiness we were to have had together. And I let her go."

Mr. Wimpole Sturgess pushed back his chair impatiently and noisily.

"You let her go? he echoed in astonishment and some anger. "You let her go—spelling her young life just for the sake of her mother's conveniences, for getting this all probability you two will be living forty or fifty years, after Lady Dare has gone to her rest? That is where I always say parents are selfish. And you love her so that your heartache breaking for her. I can see it in your eyes; I can hear it in your voice. And there will be your whole life wrecked just for the sake of her mother's conveniences, for the fear of a lie that has had its day, for a secret that if it can ever do life any not fair, my boy, this is not fair. I think you ought not to have submitted to it."

"You don't understand, sir. I assure you that it is not a case of mere conscience. Lady Dare's secret is so grave a one that its revelation would mean not only misery, but also dishonour to her family. I wish I could tell you more, but the seal of secrecy has been put upon my lips."

Mr. Wimpole Sturgess eyed him in deep bewilderment.

"All this sounds very strange," he remarked after a momentary pause. "And yet, still, I feel that I might have done you some good if you had told me of the matter earlier. You see, my boy, I am your guardian, and it is my business to do everything in my power to secure your success in the world and your happiness. I have no one that you don't know of. I ought be able to see right in a situation where for you all was darkness."

Brian Hardy, who had been standing by one of the windows, looking out with eyes so preoccupied that they saw not whether the place below were a London street or the Sahara Desert, turned round quickly as a particular word caught his ear.

"Why do you call yourself my guardian, sir? he asked, with a slight stern ring in his shark. He replied, however, promptly enough.

"Yes; I suppose that is the reason. Anyhow, its convenient for you to have a name to call me by, isn't it? Though mere friendship doesn't mean much nowadays, when every person who has talked to you for five minutes at some time or other calls you his friend and calls himself yours. And I particularly care to you than one of that sort, eh?"

"Yes, God bless you for it, the young man returned with emotion. "I owe to you everything that I have, everything that I am, everything I can ever be. And I am often troubled at the thought that I may never be able to do anything to repay you."

The cheerful old bachelor rose, too, from his chair and moved over to the window, and looked out thereat with eyes that saw not anything except what was in his own secret soul.

"You shall owe Christine Dare, too, if I can by any means manage it," he said irritably.

There was a long silence; a silence which somehow struck the younger man as being full of mysterious meaning. He thought with a pang what impassable barriers stood now between him and Christine. They surely came to the hour which had brought him to pay the unexpected visit to those rooms, which, in spite of their air of the luxury which he had foreseen, were so merely home to Christine that no place could be where Christine Dare, he had felt, was not.

"I have not told you yet my chief reason for coming here this morning," he at length broke the silence to say. It was to tell you that after what has happened I cannot accept the West End practice which I had arranged to accept before—before she was taken from me. It was only for her sake that I could have consented to work for worldly success. Now that I have not her to consider any more, I see that I had better keep on as I am doing now—that is, working for nothing, except just enough to buy the food that keeps me alive, and time to work, and doing good by preaching, under God's blessing, as much as I can."

A cloud had gathered on Mr. Wimpole Sturgess's benevolent face.

"I am very sorry indeed to hear this, Brian," he said gravely. "I am firmly of opinion that you have given a quite large enough portion of your life to this social sort of work which will do you no good, though you should stick at it for a score of years. It may be very right and it certainly is very noble to labors for others as you have done, Hitherto; but it is not to this way that you will be able to win undisputed for your own the woman you love, the woman you love for. And do you think that a man such as you can do no good in the West End as well as in the East End? There are other reasons—reasons which I shall be able to make known to you in a year's time from now—why you should consider other matters beside your own present caprice in choosing the kind of work which must become your real lifework. It would be sheer madness for you to waste your life solely on the kind of work you are doing now."

Brian Hardy started.

"You say this—you—who have had the cause of the pour at heart all your life!" he cried in surprise.

Mr. Wimpole Sturgess nodded, smiling a little sadly. "I do. And much more I will say—that there are very strong reasons, which may not now be revealed to you, why you should choose a career in which you may some day become great and eminent. The bar, the church, medicine—all these are open to you. Once I hoped to see you a soldier, but it is too late now for that. And I urged upon you the West End practice, because, as you have studied medicine and qualified yourself, and are said to be remarkably clever in surgery, it seemed as well that you should follow this profession in the end. And when you wrote the other day accepting the help I offered you, I felt that my affection for you and my watchful care of you were already in some measure repaid."

Brian drew his breath quickly.

"It was only for her sake that I accepted," he explained in a low, unsteady tone. "My love for her sake, because she was a delicate creature—my darling—who had been tenderly nurtured in luxury and cherished among friends, and I saw that the life which she was leading through my teaching was making far too grave and heavy for her strength. She had been so radiant at first, and she had grown so pale just lately, and for her sake I would have done anything—anything. But now—without her—what does it matter what I do, or what I become?"

He turned away, and the old lawyer knew that he did so to hide the betraying emotion on his face. In another moment, however, he had turned back again.

"What are the unrevealed reasons which should influence my choice of a career?" he asked, his face set, his voice full of mystery when I try to look closely into my own life?"

"I have told you that you shall know the reasons later on—I may even say shortly," Mr. Wimpole Sturgess answered, with decision, however, before the steadfast eyes of the young fellow who was pressing him. "I am not at liberty to tell you them now."

Brian Hardy stood looking at him, with drooping shoulders and sad eyes.

"Tell me one thing," he said, with his strong young right hand suddenly stretched forth, half in appeal, half in command. "Have those mysterious reasons that you speak of any connection with my secret enemy—with the unknown man who might and day watches me, and dogs me, and is always on my track?"

Again a change came over the countenance of the old lawyer, who had been to all appearance so calm. For a moment it was a more significant change; darker, more troubled, more full of fear than the touch of fear in it. Mr. Wimpole Sturgess walked the length of the room and back again before he answered. And then he only said—

"It may—it may. I cannot say. I never thought of that. But I will speak to you at once, and, unless I take some action to prevent, the sort of thing in the future, I shall be unable to sleep at night. But long has this unaccountable persecution of you been going on?"

"For four or five years," Brian answered.

"So long! And you did not tell me at first? But this is terrible," the old man said. His face had not recovered its usual hue of health and benign cheerfulness. "Something must be done to stop the rich, and at once. It can only be by the watchful mercy of God that the attempts have so far been unsuccessful."

"Do you know the man's name?" Brian Hardy asked. "Your agitation tells me that you know more of this than you will acknowledge."

Mr. Wimpole Sturgess gasped and lost control his collar in front.

"I know the name of one who, if he is living, might possibly be your assailant," he said, quickly. "But I did not believe him to be living. I believed that I had found out for myself years ago that he was dead. But there is no one else who could have a motive for desiring your death; no one else in the world but he."

And then the eminent old lawyer appeared to think that he had said too much. He looked keenly at Brian, and then coughed loudly and began to occupy himself at the deserted luncheon table with the carving of a wing of fowl which nobody wanted to eat.

CHAPTER XVII.

Christine Dare stood alone by one of the windows of her mother's morning-room at The Uplands, reading a letter from Brian Hardy—the first that had come to her since the force of pitiless circumstances had compelled her to part from him.

"My darling—yes, still my darling, now and always, whether we speak or write, or, through the mercy of God, find happiness together at last,

"I meant not to write to you, thinking it to be my duty not to make it harder for you to do what you feel to be wrong. If I did not know what this mystery is which has driven you to wreck our dream of glorious happiness, I should by this time have written you letter after letter of bitter reproach and passionate pleading. I should have felt, you see, that no difficulty could be great enough or grave enough to account for the fact that you should be eternally divided. But I know the difficulty is dreadful and deep and all its terrific meaning. And therefore I have tried to be brave and patient, so that your own heart should not suffer more through a lack of courage in me. Until now I did not think I was a coward, but now I recognize that my love for you has made me one. I could face bodily danger calmly enough—have I not faced daily fears therein?—but the fear of the poison, the knife, or the bullet that has mysteriously waited for me in almost every hour of my life, appals me now!

"But I cannot face without shrinking the grey, barren, hopeless years that my life would be without you. A year ago, perhaps, the menacing loneliness and despair would have been less terrible to me. But now, ready, I had loved you secretly for a long while; but the earlier love was not of the same kind as that which I feel for you now. You were only as a star to me then, and I worshipped you without daring to dream, much less to hope, that you could ever stoop any nearer to me. But now you have been near me—close to me, letting me see day by day and hour by hour for months how heavenly how all-satisfying life in all its joys would be for the man whom you love, as I know now that you love me. More and more every day I feel the sacredness of each hour we spent in peace which we made to each other. On that sweet day—do you remember it?—when I summoned courage to ask you if you would link your life with mine, and you answered me with a smile of joy that to do so was what your heart most longed for.

"Christine, my darling, in these days when people hold love more lightly than they should, it is not often that a man and a woman belong to each other in heart and soul and strength together as I belong to you and you belong to me. Now, bearing the burden of the slow hours of my almost sleepless nights, I have come to believe that I can speak of it to each other, and that, therefore, we should question our hearts long and deeply before we finally accept the assurance which suddenly spring into life has wrought between us. We must remember that the love that has sprung to us from the same Divine Hand which joined our hearts, and we must not be afraid that it is thoughtful, and that He shattering may after all be only a passing cloud upon our lives, that it is but a light shadow destined to darken our paths for ever. There may be—if we grow constant—a day when there shall be no more difficulty which we cannot see now, but by which we may some day scorn and grasp our best happiness again. So I want you not to grieve as those who have no hope, but to hope on and on in spite of everything, and to let your heart keep to me as steadfastly as if our wedding time had not been deferred. At the very least, you can resist any attempt to hurry on your marriage with Lord Southport; surely even in your suffering, you must realize more clearly than before the falseness and the sinfulness that would lie in that marriage.

"So I send you this message to say that I call myself still your lover in my thoughts, at least—and I think of you still as my love, my rose, my pearl, my loveliest and sweetest among women. When the heart is won, all is won; we have only to wait and to pray. It is only this hope that keeps me alive now, or, at least, from sinking into abject and unmanly despair. My heart is hungering and aching to see you, but my sense of honor will not let me come to you, or ask you to come to me, secretly, while to all the world you are pledged to another man. And openly—I may not come. I will not even do Lord Southport the wrong of writing to you again until I see our dawn of joy breaking anew. You would not tell something of the truth to Lord Southport—that is, if he would not tell your mother? She is too full of grief now, too ill with grief to be told anything which could make her in the least anxious. Do not condemn her, my darling, not ever by so much as one hard thought. We must always remember that in the whole regal tangle she has committed no wilful sin, but only a grave mistake. Think of what she has suffered, and by showing her the great love that you have for her try to make her as happy as you can.

"God bless you, my love—my love whom I will not believe to be wholly lost.

"Yours always passionately and steadfastly,

"Brian."

"Who is your long letter, from, Christine?"

The girl started a little, roused from an inward tumult of feeling in which she had not noticed that any one had entered the room. Southport had sauntered up to within a yard of her, and was looking with somewhat displeased and suspicious curiosity at the closely written page in which she had evidently been absorbed. She replied to his question at once and quite frankly.

"This letter is from Mr. Hardy."

A wave of angry color swept over the young Viscount's face.

"What! That fellow actually dares to write to you now? How better like care that I don't go out and horsewhip him."

Christine's manner seemed to have changed and hardened in a single moment.

"I am afraid you speak rashly, Lord Southport," she said coldly. "Such action would have to do a good deal that was foolish or dishonorable before another man would justify the attempt to horsewhip him. And you should not forget what happened on the occasion of your last making an attempt to carry it into effect. In any case, you would have to call me before attempting such a thing again, for the reason that Mr. Hardy is still weak and ill, and to attack him now would be cowardly."

The sudden red in Lord Southport's cheeks had on suddenly given place to an ashy unfavorable pallor.

RELICS OF OUR BRUTE PAST.

When Man Lived Hundreds of Centuries Ago.

Run your forefinger around the rim of each ear. You are almost sure to find in one of them, and quite possibly in both, a tiny hard lump.

It is only a relic of the days when, innumerable hundreds of centuries ago, man was only one of the animals of the wild, and had a pointed ear, like a wolf's or dog's.

What good is the little furrow that runs down from the nose to the middle of the upper lip? None. But it, too, has a history. It is a legacy from the time when the human upper lip was in two parts—a hare lip, like that of the rat tribe. The split has healed up long ago, but the new skin is so recent in the history of the race that hair refuses to grow on that furrow.

When a fly settles on you anywhere, can you serenely twitch that patch of skin and shake him off? Probably not, but once these skin muscles, now almost dead after centuries of clothes wearing, were as active as those of a horse. A few—a very few people can twitch their ears like a dog, and do so instinctively when startled, and cases do occasionally occur in which the scalp can be moved at will.

But, generally speaking, our skin muscles are even more dead nowadays than our ear muscles. We've neglected them. The only set still in use are those we employ when we want to raise our eyebrows.

The appendix is another thing we could do quite well without. It is a relic from old vegetarian days. It has been workless ever since mankind started eating meat eating and is apt to get in the way.

The large intestine, too, is a thing we don't need nowadays. The many coils of this long tube are kind to the doctors, quite unnecessary, now mankind has become a flesh-eating animal, and merely provide a resting place for germs. Surgeons have often cut out a few old coils and stitched the ends together. We don't really need to carry a great intestine about with us.

Another thing we don't need much nowadays is the instinct to walk on hands and feet together. You think walking upright the only natural way for man? It isn't. If ever you have to make your way along some narrow plank or some narrow, dizzy mountain ledge, you will find the old instinct strong in you.

Hints for the Home

Tested Recipes.

Mashed Turnips in Potato Mold.—Press the mashed and seasoned potatoes into a buttered border mold and place in a hot oven until lightly browned. Turn out on a heated platter and heap centre with turnips, either mashed, diced or creamed.

Carrot Pudding.—One cup grated carrot, 1 cup grated potato, 1 cup suet, 1 cup sugar, 1 cup flour, 1 cup raisins, 1 cup currants, 1 teaspoonful soda, 1 tablespoonful milk, ½ teaspoonful clove, ½ teaspoonful cinnamon, ½ teaspoonful salt and 1 egg. Steam three hours.

Eggless Caraway Cakes.—Cream one cupful of sugar and one-half cupful of butter or lard. Add one cupful of sour milk, two cupfuls of flour, sifted, with one teaspoonful of soda, one teaspoonful of cinnamon and a little nutmeg. Beat vigorously and, last of all, add a tablespoonful of caraway seeds. Bake in a moderate oven in gem pans.

Eggless Corn Meal Gems.—Sift together thoroughly two cupfuls of corn meal, one cupful of flour, one teaspoonful of salt and one tablespoonful of melted butter or lard. Into three cupfuls of sour milk dissolve one and one-half teaspoonfuls of soda, level measure. Add this to the flour, beat well and bake in gem pans or on a thin sheet. This recipe makes eighteen gems.

Oysters and Spaghetti.—Break one-fourth pound of spaghetti in small pieces. Boil in salted water for twenty minutes or until tender. Drain and blanch. Butter a baking dish, put in a layer of spaghetti and then a layer of oysters. Season with salt and pepper and dot with little pieces of butter. Continue until all the spaghetti is used, having the last layer of spaghetti. Pour a cupful of cream sauce over it and cover the top with bread crumbs mixed with a little grated cheese. Bake in a quick oven for fifteen minutes.

Mock Duck.—1 cup chop celery, 2 cups bread crumbs, 2 cups chopped walnuts, 2 cups boiled rice, 6 hard boiled eggs, chopped; 1 tablespoonful minced onion, 1 tablespoon salt, 1 tablespoon of pepper, 2 tablespoons shortening. Cook crumbs in 1 pint of water, 5 minutes; add celery and eggs; removing from fire add shortening, nuts, rice; season, mix well, with 2 raw eggs beaten well, pour into shape of a duck. Reserve portions of mixture for legs and wings, moulding it on macaroni sticks; brush over with little egg and bake one hour. Serve with apple sauce.

Sandwich Fillings.

Roquefort—Make a paste of the Roquefort cheese, butter and a little olive oil, salt and pepper. This is better served on buttered toast.

Oyster—Chop the oysters very fine, season with salt, pepper and tabasco, and serve on lettuce between sliced bread.

Graham—Mix about a teaspoonful of mustard with four teaspoonfuls of butter and chopped hard-boiled eggs, a boned anchovy and a little chopped pickle; salt and pepper to taste. Serve on graham bread.

Celery.—Add to a cup of chopped celery equal quantities of chopped celery equal quantities of chopped apples, nuts and olives and bind with mayonnaise.

Creole—Add canned sweet peppers, chopped peppers and bind with mayonnaise, then add some chopped parsley.

Luncheon—To two dozen olives, chopped fine, add a little celery salt, one teaspoonful mustard (made), a couple of drops tabasco and bind with mayonnaise.

Fruit—Chop equal quantities of chopped cherries, dates and raisins (seeded, of course); moisten with equal quantity of grape juice and orange juice, add a little grated cocoanut. Mix well.

Useful Hints.

If mustard is mixed with milk it will keep longer without discoloration.

A tablespoonful of water may be allowed for each egg used in crumbing croquettes or fish.

If you have trouble with cream whipping readily, being too thin, add the white of an unbeaten egg at the start and it will whip nicely.

To make gelatine pudding more nourishing, mix with milk instead of water, but be careful not to have the milk too hot or it will curdle.

When mashing potatoes always use boiling, not cold milk. Beat hard and the potatoes will be light and fluffy.

A chicken for broiling should be wrapped in a buttered paper bag. This will keep the meat moist and retain the flavor.

There is no simpler way to clarify lard used for frying purposes than by heating it thoroughly with several slices of raw potato and straining.

There is no better way to scrub a clothes line to wind it around a board, such as dress materials are wound on, and then scrub with a brush dipped in rich suds.

It is well when washing a piece of choice yellowed lace to dip it in milk before ironing. Always place a piece of tissue paper directly over the lace so that the warm iron will not touch the fabric.

When vegetables or other food stuffs become scorched, remove the kettle at once from the stove and put it into a pan of cold water. In a quarter of an hour, you will be surprised to find the suggestion of scorch almost if not entirely gone.

Boil out the coffee pot at least once a week. Dissolve a tablespoon of ordinary baking soda in enough cold water to fill the utensil two-thirds full, and let it boil for 15 minutes. Rinse it out most carefully and then wipe perfectly dry.

If a recipe for soup calls for cream, and it is not at hand, try a milk and egg substitute. Boil a cupful of milk and when it is cooled add a beaten egg. Strain and add a teaspoonful of butter. Add this mixture to the soup, bring to the boiling point, and serve at once.

When cooking canned string beans try the following method to avoid their having a strong taste: Put them on to boil in cold water. After they have boiled for a short time pour the water off and put boiling water on them to finish the cooking.

UNUSUAL BADGE FOR HEROES

Men Who Have Won the Victoria Cross Twice or More.

The clasp granted to Lieut. Arthus Martin Leake, R.A.M.C., to the Victoria Cross which he won in the South African war is the first ever awarded in the history of that supreme decoration.

"It is ordained that anyone who, after having received the Cross, shall again perform an act of bravery, which, if he had not received such Cross, would have entitled him to it, such further act shall be recorded by a Bar attached to the ribband by which the Cross is suspended, and for every additional act of bravery an additional Bar may be added."

This is the passage in the Royal Warrant of February 5, 1856, establishing the Victoria Cross, which provides for a possibility which has now been realized.

Lieut. Martin Leake, who won the Cross for gallantry at Vlakfontein in 1902, was then serving with Baden Powell's Police, having gone out to South Africa with the Hertfordshire Yeomanry.

He is a medical man, trained at University College Hospital, and on his return to England he went into private practice at Ware, Hertfordshire. In September last he re-entered the army and was given a commission in the R.A.M.C.

It has frequently been stated that Clasps have been won by heroes in the past, but the "Gazette" contains no record of such an event.

The late Sir Charles John Stanley Gough, one of two famous brothers who won the Cross in the Indian Mutiny, was credited in the possessing three Bars. It is true that he was decorated for no fewer than four conspicuous and separate acts of bravery, one of which was saving the life of his brother, Lieut Hugh Gough, who also won the V.C., but he was not gazetted until October 21, 1859, when these various acts were enumerated.

Major Berryman, a Crimean veteran, who was "mentioned" for his bravery on four occasions, was another V.C. wearer supposed to possess a Bar, but he himself denied it.

If London Starved.

Facing the almost impossible contingency of London being blockaded, and upon starvation rations, one wonders whether the animals in the Zoo, at Regent's Park, would be slaughtered, as was the case with all the animals in the Parisian Zoo in 1870—some 45 years ago—during the siege of the Gay City, says London Answers. Bear steaks and elephant cutlets were regarded as the greatest of luxuries, after the ordinary courses of a menu of the farmyard description had long since become unpurchasable. The prices that poultry and other articles fetched seem beyond belief. Turkeys cost 100 francs (£4) each, and upwards. A goose would fetch 60 francs, while a sovereign was the price for a little fowl. Vegetables were equally expensive, and those who indulged in the luxury of carrots, turnips, and potatoes had to pay as much as fivepence each for the two first-named, while the common or garden "spud" would fetch as much as a couple of pounds sterling per bushel. The feline quadruped was in great demand, and cats were disguised in many a pie as rabbits, while the flesh of dogs was worth half-a-crown a pound, and of horses three to four shillings.

In some streets of Paris oil still is used as an illuminant, neither gas nor electricity having been introduced.

Three asbestos mines have been opened in China, where extensive deposits of the mineral have been found.

RUSSIAN MOUJIK AT HOME

INTERESTING PEN - PICTURE OF HIS LIFE.

The Bearded Fellow Believes in God, the Tsar and His Native Country.

There is no country in the world which numbers amongst its inhabitants so many different nationalities as the vast Empire which stretches from the Baltic in the West to the Pacific in the East, and from the Polar regions in the North to the tropical countries in the South — England's ally, Russia.

But the greater part of its 175,000,000 population, the bulk of the Russian people, are the 100,000,000 Russian peasants, or, as they are generally called "the Moujiks." Although scattered in a country with climates of the greatest variety, they are very similar in habits and customs, and what can be said of the Moujik in cold Siberia is true of the South Russian peasant.

A Child of Nature.

Civilization, as it is understood in this country, has not made its way yet to the Russian Moujik; he is still very much a child of Nature. Love, hatred, joy, and sorrow he shows without disguise; he is not violent in the expression of any emotion, yet he feels deeply. He is not emotional, but always inclined to melancholic contemplation; persevering, even obstinate, yet easily persuaded and easily led anywhere; cunning, and at the same time simple-minded, and with a child's faith.

The Slav character at its best can be observed in that big, bearded fellow who believes in God, the Tsar, and his country.

What are his needs in life? A small cabin or three-roomed house, a small field, some cattle—and he is satisfied. If he is not hungry, if he has a shelter over his head without the rain passing through it, he considers himself happy. Greediness, passion for money, is very rare among the Moujiks; all his ambitions and dreams are another acre of land, one more horse or ox.

A large family is not considered a burden, as every member, whether male or female, works and helps. Therefore, early marriages, such as are unknown in other countries, are very frequent. Fathers of nineteen and mothers of even a younger age are not rare. The patriarchal family life still exists; the father is head of the family, his decisions being indisputable.

When the son married, if not living separately, he brings his wife to his parents, so that the husband's family is always the winner by getting a new working member. Marriages are still contracted in very many cases by the choice of the parents, and the parties whom it most concerns are seldom consulted. Yet such marriages are no less happy than those in which the choice is given to the young people themselves.

With Few Pleasures.

The amusements of the Moujik are very few. Dances in the long winter evenings, where many a love affair begins to bud, by the music of accordeons, or "harmonicta," the Russian national instrument, girls' choirs, or the famous "Khorovods" in summer, with a few quaint customs, such as masquerading at Christmas, fortune-telling on the eve of New Year's day, that is all which relieves the monotony of the village life.

Owing to the vast area of Russia, and the few railways, thousands upon thousands of villages are at a great distance from the bustle of city life. The visit of a nomadic merchant, who travels about in his cart all the year round with a stock of wares to villages in this or that province, covering thousands of miles, is quite an event in the monotonous life of the village population. The newspaper is still a luxury to the Russian Moujik, and all news of the outer world is brought to him by these merchants.

The Moujik is patriotic, but his patriotism does not resemble what it generally understood by this word. He is not Imperialistic; he does not think of the extension of his country. Firstly, because he knows she is enormous; secondly, he thinks that nothing exists outside her is worth having. He is very peaceful; a warlike spirit is a thing unknown to him; but if he is ordered to fight for his country, he will go doggedly forward. If pushed back, he will resume his march—never tiring, never despairing—with obstinate constancy. He will die without hatred and without regret, as he knows it is for his "little mother," Russia.

A New Era.

The great curse of the Moujik, easily explained and, perhaps, forgiven, is the "vodka." The amount of "vodka" consumed a year in Russia is appalling. But, as said before, the Moujiks especially the older men, know of no amusement, and their only pleasure where they could drown their sorrow was the glass of "vodka." The recent prohibition of the Government sale of "vodka" has already shown a great improvement in the life of the Moujik, and will, perhaps, be the turning point of his existence.

The Russian Moujik of the future will have the qualities and virtues of his predecessor, without his evils. Education and "civilization" will not spoil his most valued treasure: a kind heart.

"IN DEATH'S DARK VALE."

Scottish Privates Prayed as Germans Surrounded Town.

The scene was in the loft of a Belgian house, the characters three Scottish privates and a corporal, cut off during a hurried retreat before an invading horde of Germans. All that was left for the four men to do was to lie low while the enemy were burning, looting, and killing in the street below, and this is their story as told in the Scottish U.F. Church Record:—For hours they waited amid all the terrible sounds of war and carnage, venturing only to guess as to what was transpiring outside.

Suddenly the corporal said, "Lads, it's time for church parade; let's hae a wee bit service here; it may be our last." He took out a small Testament from his breast pocket. "Canna we sing something first. Try your hand at the 23rd Psalm. Quiet, noo—very quiet," and the four men sang:

"Yea, though I walk in death's dark vale,
Yet will I fear none ill;
For Thou art with me, and Thy rod
And staff my comfort still."

Then the corporal began reading: "Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul, but rather fear Him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell. Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? And one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are numbered. Fear not, therefore; ye are of more value than many sparrows."

Shouts rose from below, doors banged, and glass was smashed, but he went on: "He that findeth his life shall lose it; and he that loseth his life for My sake shall find it." He ended, "We maun finish it oot. Let us pray." The corporal stood, the others knelt. While he prayed a heavy hand thrust open the door, and they heard an exclamation of surprise.

Not a man moved, and the corporal went calmly on. They heard the click of heels that told them a German officer was standing at attention. For a moment the suspense lasted, and then came the soft closing of the door. No one else came near them, and at dusk the four men ventured forth and managed to regain the British lines.

HAS BULLET IN HEART.

Some Stories of Wounded Soldiers Now in London Hospital.

Among the many curious cases of wounds which have been investigated by the X-rays at St Bartholomew's Hospital in London is one in which a German bullet was found imbedded in the muscular part of a soldier's heart.

The radiographer who located the bullet said that it entered the man's left shoulder and burrowed downward. The amazing feature of the case was that after the man had been hit he walked for a mile and a half to an ambulance. He did not realize that he was wounded, he said, until he saw a few splashes of blood.

The bullet was not removed, and the man lived afterward.

This is by no means an isolated case of a man living, and even of following some occupation, with a foreign body in a vital part. Two interesting radiographs in the laboratory at St Bartholomew's Hospital illustrate this. One is of a German bullet imbedded in the right lung. It measures about one and a quarter inches long, and the delineation is perfect. The other shows a number of pieces of shrapnel in the skull cavity at the base of the eye underneath the brain. The shrapnel entered one side of the cheek and penetrated through to the other side.

Brothers Fighting Brothers.

A Paris newspaper says that in the present war a Swiss mother has lost four of her sons who fought in different armies. By her first husband, an Austrian, she had two sons. After his death she married a Frenchman, by whom she had two more sons. When the war broke out the four sons took face to face, well of their mother, two joining the Austrian army and two the French. Fate willed that the Austrian sons should be sent to reinforce the Germans at a point of the front where the French sons, artillerymen and cavalrymen respectively, were fighting. All the four sons were killed in the same engagement.

COLLIES AT KIRK.

Picture of a Scottish Congregation a Century Ago.

Only very lately, a recent writer declares, has it ceased to be customary in Scotland for a Scottish shepherd to be accompanied into church by his collies. Even now, the attendance of a discreet dog or so is not infrequent, and passes without criticism; but the privileged animals must be of quiet and irreproachable behavior. Conditions that were common a century ago would to-day excite the horror of worshippers no more truly pious than their grandfathers, and it must requirements of religious decorum far less rigid. Dr. Robert Russell of Yarrow Kirk has drawn an amazing and amusing picture of the country congregation, human and canine, as it used to be:

"There were no doors on the pews," he exclaims, "and nothing but a narrow deal as a footboard, and no separation below between them; and it can easily be imagined that when the shepherds from Deuchrick and Yarrow came to church each shepherd was accompanied by his dog and snugly wrapped in his plaid—no matter what the weather or the season—what rows there were.

"On the slightest growl, the dogs all pricked up their ears. If a couple fell out and showed light it was the signal for a general melee. The rest that were prowling about, or half asleep at their master's feet, rushed from their lairs, found a way through below the pews, and among the feet of the occupants, and raised a dust that fairly enveloped them. Then the strife waxed fierce and furious; the noise became deafening, the voice of the minister was literally drowned, and he was fain to pause, whether in preaching or in prayer.

"Two or three shepherds had to leave their places and use their nibbies unmercifully before the rout was quelled and the service resumed."

When the belligerent animals refrained from interrupting the service, they frequently went to the other extreme and participated in it—joining in the singing of the psalms with long-drawn howls. The benediction, as a matter of course, was always pronounced with the people seated "to cheat the dowgs"; then, at the first movement after it, "a perfect storm of barking broke out as the dogs poured out of the building ahead of the people."

It was often inconvenient for the shepherds to leave their collies behind, and it was long before the dogs were excluded by order. One minister gave great offense through placing such emphasis on the Scriptural words, "Without are dogs," as pointedly to suggest the inference that he considered their presence within the church distinctly undesirable.

FINDS IN THE TRENCHES.

Valuable Articles Are Sometimes Picked Up By Soldiers.

From time to time some extraordinary lucky finds have been come upon by our soldiers when trench-digging.

A sergeant in the Black Watch informed the writer that two of his men, when digging some deep trenches near a ruined peasant's cottage in the neighborhood of the Yser, came upon a big pile of English, French, and German gold and silver coins, the total value of which was close on £500. The men divided the spoils between them, and that very night both were wounded, and in three days were sent to England, taking their find with them.

The peasant's cottage had been in ruins for several years, and the coins had evidently been placed there a good time ago, for none of them bore a more recent date than 1880.

A girl typist in a London office recently received from her brother at the front a gold and enamel necklace, which he found in a trench his company had captured from the Germans, and which had apparently been dropped there by one of its previous occupants. The necklace turned out a valuable find. The girl's employer, who had some knowledge of the value of antique works of art, noticed the necklace on the girl, who told him how it had come into her possession. He told her that it was probably 200 years old, and of a design that was extremely valuable. The girl then had it valued by an expert, who valued it at about £1,000.

In another trench captured by the Germans one of our soldiers found a beautiful gold cigarette-case, exquisitely chased and bearing some words in German which Tommy could not read. Later his officer read them for him, and explained that they meant that the case had been a present from the German Emperor to some officer.

"Well," said Tommy, with a chuckle, "perhaps I may surprise old Kaiser Bill by offering him a cigarette out of his bloomin' lovely box when we catch him!"

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL STUDY

INTERNATIONAL LESSON, APRIL 11.

Lesson II. David Anointed King—I Sam. 16. Golden Text, I Sam. 16.7.

Verse 4. Came to meet him trembling—Samuel's visits had often been made to rebuke the people of sin and to correct abuses. Hence the elders, surmising that he came for such purpose, would tremble. The fact that Samuel was no longer at friendship with Saul should heighten their apprehension.

5. Sanctify yourselves—The customary ceremonial purification, which included washing the garments (Gen. 35. 2; Exod. 19. 10; Josh. 3. 5).

And he sanctified Jesse and his sons—He superintended the sanctification of Jesse and his sons. This would take place in Jesse's house and give Samuel an opportunity for closer acquaintance with Jesse and his sons.

Called to the sacrifice—He told the elders of the city to come with him to the sacrifice. He was careful to see that Jesse and his sons would be present.

6. And said—That is, he thought within himself. Samuel still remembered Saul, who was head and shoulders above the rest of his tribe. So when Eliab appeared, Samuel concluded that he was the Lord's chosen. For he had all the outward qualification of a king. As the successor of Saul, Eliab fitted the requirements. So Samuel reflected. But he was soon to learn that commanding height and pleasing countenance were not the only evidences of kingly qualities. In fact, these were of no significance if the real qualities were lacking.

7. But Jehovah said unto Samuel—Something in Eliab must have struck Samuel as unfavorable, and he heard the voice of God prompting him to be careful in his observations.

For Jehovah seeth not as man seeth—See Luke 16. 15; Acts 1. 24. Israel's first king was a man after their heart: large in stature, commanding in appearance; but their choice of Saul was influenced by the external appearance. Now Jehovah will choose for himself and he will look upon the heart.

9. Shammah—Also called Shimeah (2 Sam. 13. 3). He was the third son of Jesse, the father of Jonadab, "a very subtile person" (2 Sam. 13. 3), and of Jonathan, who slew a giant of (2 Sam. 21. 21; 1 Chron. 20. 6, 7).

11. We will not sit down—The Hebrew has around, meaning "We will not sit around the sacrifice table until David appears."

12. Now he was ruddy—In southern countries the hair and complexion were usually dark. One who was "ruddy," that is, red of hair and fair of skin, was particularly attractive, goodly to look upon. See Gen. 25. 25 for a similar description of Joseph, and Exod. 2. 2 for a description of Moses.

13. The horn of oil (see verse 1 of this chapter) and anointed him—See 2 Sam. 2. 4. Just as Saul had been anointed twice (1 Sam. 10. 1; 11. 14, 15), so David was twice anointed.

In the midst of his brethren—In the presence of his brethren. It is evident, from the after history, that David's brothers did not realize what had happened to him. It has been suggested that "they may have supposed that Samuel had selected David for a pupil in his prophetic school" (see 1 Sam. 19. 18ff).

And the Spirit of Jehovah came mightily upon David from that day forward—So the Spirit came upon Saul at first (1 Sam. 10. 6). So the Spirit came upon the judges (see Judg. 3. 10; 6. 34; 11. 29; 14. 19; 15. 14). Compare Acts 1. 8, "But ye shall receive power, when the Holy Spirit is come upon you."

David means "beloved," or "darling," probably in reference to his being the youngest of the family.

Three Timely Hints.

If you are one of those unfortunate persons to whom the winter and spring bring a series of colds and chills you might ponder over the following three tips, and give them at least a trial. When you are going to a place of worship, lecture, concert, or similar place, carry your overcoat on your arm as you go. The exercise of walking will keep you warm. Arrived, don your coat. The habit of removing it and sitting down means that the body rapidly chills, with the result that colds come. Draughts and gusts have been blamed, but the foregoing is often the real cause. And, instead of wearing your neck muffler or scarf in the usual way, with the ends in front, reverse. There is no V opening at the neck then for winds to search. The third tip is to have your waistcoat made of the same material at the back as the front, and cut deeper. The back is a most vulnerable spot, and tailors, for some reason, leave it the less protected. The above three good tips should mean no bad colds.

OLAMIS

Mr Kenneth McLennan's house had a narrow escape from being burned to the ground on Friday night. The fire started from the chimney and had made pretty good headway before it was noticed. An alarm was sent out over the telephone lines, and in a few minutes the neighbors and quite a number from Clamis were on the scene. Things looked rather serious for a time but the men fought it with water and soon got it under control, but not before a good deal of damage was done to the house and part of the contents.

Mr Stevens, of McMaster, occupied the pulpit of the Baptist Church on Sunday.

Miss Margaret Campbell returned to Harriston on Wednesday.

Mrs Laura Pollock of London is visiting her parents, Mr and Mrs Jos Stanley.

Mrs Alex McKennitt spent the week end with friends in Clifford.

Mrs J E McNally has returned home from North Dakota where she was visiting her daughter, Mrs Woods.

Miss Jennie Stanley of New York came home to attend the funeral of her eldest brother, Ernest.

A quiet but pretty wedding took place at Mr and Mrs Kirktown's on Tuesday, March 23rd, at 5 30, when their daughter Lizzie was united in marriage to Mr Roy P Kennedy. The bride, who wore a gown of white silk with a tunic of shadow lace and carried a boquet of white carnations, entered the drawing room on the arm of her father to the strains of the wedding march played by the bride's aunt, Mrs Alex McKennitt. She was assisted by her sister Martha, who was also dressed in white silk and carried a boquet of pink carnations. The groom was supported by his cousin, Mr Howard Parker. The ceremony was performed by Rev Mr DeMille. The groom's gift to the bride was a pendant of pearls, to the bridesmaid a wristlet watch and to the groomsman a pair of gold cuff links. After a sumptuous repast the happy couple left for their future home on the 2nd. All join in wishing them long life and happiness.

UNDERWOOD

Miss Mary Drummond recently spent a few days in Port Elgin visiting Miss Winnie Struthers.

Mr Jack McKay, of the 6th, was operated on for appendicitis on Wednesday night. We hope he will soon be able to be around again.

The Bruce Municipal Telephone commissioners held their last meeting, before the annual meeting, here on Friday of last week to finish the year's business. It is understood the annual meeting of the subscribers will be held about the second week in April.

Quite a few of the farmers have been busy making maple syrup. During the first of last week the sap ran freely, but the cold weather later greatly checked it.

Mr Arthur Abbs has returned home from Guelph after taking the three months' dairy course at the O.A.C.

CARGILL

It is our sad duty to report the death of Mr John Clark who resided here. The deceased had been ailing for some time and passed quietly away on Saturday evening about seven o'clock. The funeral, which was held on Monday afternoon, was largely attended. The deceased leaves to mourn his loss a wife and one daughter, Reta, who have our sincere sympathy in their sad bereavement.

Mr Harold and Miss Vera Loughleen, who have been visiting relatives in Woodstock and other points returned home Saturday night.

Mrs W D Cargill, who has been residing in Toronto for the past few months, is spending the week at her home here.

We find it our sad duty to relate the death of Mr Thomas Christie who has been a resident in this neighborhood for many years. He passed peacefully away on Saturday night about nine o'clock. The deceased, who was 85 years of age, is survived by a large family who have our sympathy. The interment took place in Walkerton cemetery on Tuesday afternoon at two o'clock.

Mr Lorne and Miss Gladys Keeling, of Southampton, spent Saturday here.

Mrs F L Martin spent Sunday with friends in Paisley.

EDEN GROVE

Mr and Mrs Wm English and child left on Tuesday for the West. They will be much missed in our midst.

Making maple syrup is the order of the day.

Mr L Stansel has been on the sick list, but is on the mend again.

Seiler & Son are busy repairing and painting buggies these times.

Mr Wm Alexander has moved up from the flats to Mr Robt English's place near the Grove.

Mrs John Connor has been very poorly lately.

Mr Jas Alexander of Cargill, who bought Mr Tom Reaburn's place near the 12th, we understand has let it on shares to Mr John Brown for this summer. Mr Reaburn has moved to a farm near Elmwood.

PINKERTON

Mr Harry Elphick left for the west last week. We understand Mr Jerry Desmond left on Monday of this week.

Mr Robert Gale, who has been spending some time with his parents at the manse, returned to his home near Alma on Monday.

Mr Jas Andrews was in Walkerton on Tuesday and Wednesday of last week serving on the jury.

Miss Alma Reid, of Toronto, was summoned home last week to nurse her mother, Mrs Adam Reid, who was suffering from a severe attack of la grippe. We understand that she is well on the road to recovery.

CANTIRE

While working in Geo Alexander's bush on con 4 last Wednesday, Mr Arch Blue met with a misfortune, cutting his kneecap badly. It is hoped Archie will be back on the firing line soon again.

WALKERTON

The Brant township council will now have to bring their own meals when they attend council meetings, as the tenant in the township hall, Mr John Monk, who used to feed the rural statesmen when they came forth to do legislative stunts, has moved out of the building. As cold meals may bring on cold feet, the change will not be in the public good, especially when the loss of rent is considered.

Since our last issue Registrar McFarlane has filed his statement of claim against the publishers of The Bruce Herald and Times, in which we note he asks for $1000 damages in connection with his recent libel suit.

Mr George Farr, an ex-councillor of Brant, and one of the most prominent men of the township, died at the Bruce County Hospital, Walkerton, on Tuesday morning last from paralysis of the stomach and bowels, the result of an anaesthetic administered on an operation for appendicitis the previous Thursday. The deceased was 55 years of age, was born in Northumberland county, and came to Brant township about 22 years ago, purchasing a farm on the 15th con, where he continued to reside until his death.

Rev John Kemp Garner, for 67 years a Methodist preacher, died at the home of his son, Rev E W Garner, here, on Sunday last, aged 91 years, 6 months and 10 days. The deceased, who was born in Yorkshire, England, was found at the age of 17 years exhorting on the Doncaster circuit, and was announced as the boy preacher. After serving as a minister in the Old Country for a number of years, he came to Canada in 1848, and after a short pastorate in Hamilton, removed to Guelph where he did pioneer circuit work in thirteen of the surrounding townships. He travelled into Bruce 19 the early days and did splendid ministerial work. His remains were interred in the Hanover cemetery on Wednesday.

GRESHAM

Miss Mary Pace is at present visiting friends in Port Elgin.

Miss Nelson, of the 2nd of Saugeen, returned home after spending a couple of weeks' vacation with her uncles here, W J and M Nelson.

We are pleased to learn that Mrs Ed Smith is improving nicely.

We are sorry to learn of the demise of one of our few remaining pioneers in the person of Mr Richard Mills, late of the 10th con, at the advanced age of 89 years.

We are sorry to report that Mr McKinnon of the 6th con is not improving as quickly as we would like to see him.

Mr Geo Brown was confined to the house last week with a severe attack of lagrippe.

PARKER—ROSS

A quiet but pretty wedding took place at six o'clock on Wednesday evening, March 24th, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Ross, Laval, when their eldest daughter, Ida May, was united in marriage to Mr. James Howard Parker, of Greenock. Rev. A. McNab, of Underwood, conducted the ceremony in the presence of only the immediate relatives. The bride entered the room on the arm of her father to the strains of the wedding march played by Miss Margaret M. Sharpe, and took her place beside the groom beneath an arch of evergreens trimmed with autumn leaves and wedding bells. The bride looked charming in a gown of Copenhagen blue brocaded silk daintily trimmed with silk embroidered net and silver bugles, and wore a veil with wreath of lily of the valley and carried a boquet of flowers. Following congratulations dinner was served in the dining room which was decorated for the occasion. The groom's gift to the bride was a sunburst of pearls. The bride's travelling dress was navy blue serge with hat to match, and wore Astrachan coat with muff to match. The bride received many handsome and useful gifts. The happy couple left on the morning train for a trip to Woodstock, St. Marys and other other points.

SHE KNEW

Sir David Baird, a man of notoriously bad temper, was once taken prisoner by Hyder Ali. The Oriental despot chained his prisoners two and two and flung them into an underground cell. The news of this cruel incarceration caused a thrill of horror in England, but the sole comment made upon it by Baird's stoic mother was: "God help the puir chiel that's chained wi' me Davy."

CLEAN UP

Now let us give the war a rest, the rout, the siege, the sally, and gaily shed our coat and vest, and go and clean the alley! Let's gather up the dogs and cats which this life departed, and let tin cans and bricks and bats go off to the dump to be carted. In winter you may voice your views, which you believe important, and base long sermons on the news, but in the spring you can't. Then every able-bodied man should whoop the "Clean Up" slogan, and chase the old tomato can, the cast-off hat and brogan. So let us clear our bulging brows of trifling thoughts and narrow, and gather up the old dead cows, and work the rake and harrow. The rubbish left by careless men, and lazy human cheeses, will bring a host of germs again, and they'll bring panic diseases. And forty billion flies will come as many microbes bearing, and round our weary heads they'll hum and keep us busy swearing. Clean Up! Clean Up! On every block let all the workers rally! No man should stand round and talk until he's cleaned his alley!—Walt Mason

—Mr. John Clanton, a former business man of our town, was over from Barrie during Easter visiting his brother-in-law, Mr. S. Gordon, of Greenock, who at present is in very poor health. Mr. Clanton left here some seventeen years ago, and went into business in Orangeville, but is now living retired in Barrie, having been fortunate enough to make a competence out of a large tract of timber land he purchased in British Columbia and sold to the C.P.R.

MOFFAT—McMORRAN

A very quiet but pretty wedding was solemnized on Wednesday, March 24th, at the home of the bride's parents, when Miss Nellie Pindlay, second daughter of Mr and Mrs. R. W. McMorran, of Somerset, was united in marriage to Mr. George Elmer Moffat, son of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Moffat, of Elgin, by the Rev. J. R. Campbell. At the appointed hour, to the strains of Lohengrin's bridal chorus played by Miss Myrta McMorran, the bride entered the parlor on the arm of her father, where the groom awaited her. She looked very dainty in her bridal dress of cream satin with overdress of cream ninon, trimmed with amaudoun and carrying a boquet of cream roses, carnations and ferns, her only ornament being a lovely pearl necklace, the gift of the groom. After the wedding breakfast the young couple left on the noon train amid showers of rice and confetti for their future home at Elgin.—Echo, Swan Lake, Man.

—Miss Edith Anstead, whose marriage notice appears in another column of this paper, was the recipient of many very pretty and useful presents from her numerous friends including those of the church and Sunday school in which she was an active worker during the past four years, also four showers that were given her during the last two months of her stay in Toronto. The ceremony was performed by assistant pastor Rev. C. S. McGaffin, in the chapel of St. Paul's church, and was witnessed by a number of the bride's friends. The happy couple departed at once for Hamilton to spend a few days with the bride's sister, and later to visit her father in Paisley.

—Mrs. L. R. Putnam will not receive again until July.

—Mr. Thos. McBeath, Goble St., celebrated his 85th birthday on April 5th Easter Monday.

—All school classes will continue to occupy the old quarters for two weeks after the Easter holidays.

—Miss Marion McAllister, of Gillies Hill, spent part of the holidays with Walkerton friends.

—George, a young son of ex-reeve Geo. McKay, of Elderslie, had his arm broken while playing at school one day last week.

—Mr Mac Sinclair and Mrs Storey of Toronto came up to attend the funeral of their mother, the late Mrs Sinclair, of Bruce Tp.

—Mr. Alex. Brunton is elected a councillor of Saugeen Tp. by acclamation to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of of Mr. D. Duke.

—"Craigie" McArthur's Bookstore, for $1.25. Worth $1.25.

—Mrs. Thos. Breen of Owen and Mrs. W. Grant of Dunblane, went to Bruce's on Monday to attend the funeral of their cousin, the late Miss McCra[illegible].

—Corp. S. Tooke and Pte. A. Blue, of the second contingent camp at London, Pte. S. Fleming, Thos. Babcock and A. Cullum of the third contingent at Guelph, were up home over Easter Sunday.

—Mr. R. Tucker, medical student at Queen's University, has enlisted with the R.A.M.C. of Queen's stationary hospital to be established in France, and made a fine well visit to his family here over Sunday.

—The Picture Exhibit advertised to be held in the School this week will be held in the town hall instead, it being considered advisable to allow the painting to thoroughly dry before using the new building.

—Mr. Stanley Burnett, of the Standard Bank staff here, has been transferred to the Arkona branch, in Lambton County. Stanley is one of the young men who will be missed from his home town, and will be a valued employee of the bank wherever he may be placed.

—A meeting of the Paisley Rifle Association will be held on Friday evening, April 9th, in R. G. Eckel's store. A full attendance is requested as arrangements are to be made for the summer's shooting. S. F. B. BALLACHEY, Sec'y.

—Miss Mary E. Fletcher, graduate nurse of Toronto General Hospital, has been selected by the University of Toronto as one of a staff of nursing sisters to go with the University hospital to the front. Miss Fletcher was up to spend Easter with her mother and friends at their home on Inkerman St.

—Mrs. Alice Sinclair will open a kindergarten classroom above Putnam's store for children of from four to six years. All parents who have already spoken of their children attending, and any others who care to take advantage of this, kindly have the children there at ten o'clock Monday morning, April 12th.

STRANGE NERVOUS DISORDER

THE DISEASE OF FEAR IS A REAL AILMENT.

Dread of High Places, Crowds and Solitude are Symptoms of Mental Malady.

A cure for "disease of fear," one of the modern mental maladies classified by neurologists, is being undertaken in the new psychiatric clinic of John Hopkins university. It is not the natural terror which seizes one in imminent peril, but the irrational dread which clutches its victims at the sight of things not in themselves dangerous, or at the thought of perils which are far removed.

For instance, one of those afflicted with particular form of the malady may be overtaken, as he walks along the street, by a fear of high places. He imagines himself vividly to be leaning over the wall of a great skyscraper and feels with a hideous anguish at every atom of his being the pull of gravitation straining to drag him down to death. In vain his reason assures him that his feet are safely planted on solid ground. A terror which he knows to be irrational grips his heart with a pressure which utterly sickens and unmans him. And the more he attempts to rid his mind of the obsessing horror the more ruthlessly it presses upon him.

Fear of Cutlery.

Or, take a woman in a case under recent observation who was dogged by an unearthly fear of cutlery. The sight of the most harmless table utensil would make her desperate. She would almost faint if she saw an assortment of goods in a hardware store. She would shriek if she caught a glimpse of her husband shaving. Whenever fresh cutlery arrived at the house she would instantly throw it out of the window. Her family was reduced to the most ludicrous make-shifts for tableware.

These unfortunates are not insane. Except for the one mental twist they are entirely rational. The proof is that they realize intellectually—something which insane persons never do—the absurdity and unreasonableness of their psychological sufferings.

This strange nervous disorder is far from uncommon, but has only recently been recognized as a disease. Formerly, victims of the malady were merely told not to be silly, or admonished to control themselves. But to-day science declares the disease of fear to be a real ailment and is attempting to work out a technique for its treatment and cure.

History shows that many illustrious persons were afflicted by the disorder now defined as a disease. Both Napoleon and Wellington would rush from a room if it contained a cat. Erasmus, the great reformer, would be thrown into a high fever if he so much as looked at a bowl of lentils. Bayle, the philosopher, would fall into convulsions if he heard the dripping of water from a tap. The sight of a goat would make Tycho Brahe, the astronomer, faint away. Samuel Johnson touched with his hand every post which he passed—if he neglected one he would retrace his steps in dismay to repair the omission.

Some of the Pet Aversions.

Some of the pet aversions, conceived by patients seem to be odd and amusing eccentricities. The bete noir of the disordered mind may be a particular flower, an odor, a color, fire or water. Many persons dread stepping upon a crack in the pavement, and avoid this calamity as gingerly as life depended upon it. Common phobias are those of noise. Rattling steam pipes, dripping water or buzzing gas burners will drive some persons distracted. An authority reports an old woman who could never put her umbrella down without tapping the floor four times with the ferrule. If a stranger came in and placed his umbrella mistakenly in the rack, she would pull it out apprehensively, strike the floor four times and place it back again.

Silence brings a nervous crisis upon certain psycho-neurotics. Some dread light, and others are terrified by darkness. The phobiac of high places cannot ascend in an elevator or sit in the gallery of a theater or stand near the edge of a cliff, or even think of the idea of altitude without suffering acute anguish. This is not the natural sensation of vertigo, but a nameless and hideous fright which he himself while in its grasp, helplessly realizes is preposterous.

The ultimate terror, the fear of being afraid, has been noted by certain observers. A classic example of phobophobia is De Maupassant's story of a man who killed himself the night before a duel because he feared he would show cowardice on the field of honor.

Sometimes the victims, by a supreme exertion of their intelligence and will, free themselves from their obsessions. But few ever accomplish this self-deliverance. To neurologists, then, comes the question as to what can be done to help and perhaps cure these psychic invalids.

The first step is to seek the cause of their mental disorders. The fact seems to be established that psychoneurosis has no physical basis. It is not, like many forms of insanity, induced by physical lesions of the brain, or degeneration of the brain cells. The patient is not diseased in any physical sense, and yet he is Desperately Sick Mentally.

So the scientists have invented the "psychic wound" as the cause of the "disease of fear."

This "psychic wound," they say, is the result sometimes of an accumulation of misfortunes, such as the growing misery of an unhappy marriage, chronic money difficulties, uncongenial surroundings or unrealized ambitions. Or, again, it may be derived from a single violent shock, such as the death of a near relative or the patient's presence in a fire, a railroad smashup or a shipwreck. There is first a permanent psychic restlessness from which emerges, sometimes immediately, sometimes after months or years, a perversion of some kind. It has been found that a majority of the sufferers are women, not men.

The most promising success in treating the disease has thus far been found to lie in the use of mental suggestion. The woman referred to above, who had a morbid horror of cutlery, was directed just before she said her prayers each night, to kneel down, put her face in her hands, and repeat the formula:

"This fear is nonsense; I shall harm myself or others. I am perfectly sane, and I am going to get well. There is no more harm in a razor than in a stick of wood."

She was sent to the country, where she had a garden to work in and a dog and canary to care for. After nine months of treatment she declared that her fear was gone, she believed, for ever. An important part of the treatment was inducing her to see her terror of cutlery in its comical light.

Others have been assisted by persuading them to take part in social service work, in which, burdened with the troubles of others, they forget their own. Still others were benefitted by being taught some form of art, such as clay modelling, or were soothed with music.

HUSBANDS AS MASTERS.

A Case Where the Wife Proved to Be It.

Two friends who had often wondered how many husbands were masters in their own homes formed a plan for deciding the matter. They were to start out with two horses and a chicken. If the first man they met proved to be the master of his own household he was to have one of the horses; if his wife was the ruler he was to have the chicken. They had not gone far when they came upon a farmer, and they put the question to him. Dropping his rake and stretching himself to his full height of six feet, he replied that he was "boss of everything for forty acres round," and he would like to see the woman who could order him in any way. "Very well, sir," said one of the investigators, "we are glad to find a man who is the actual head of his home, and we are going to give you one of these horses in appreciation. Which do you prefer, the brown or the grey horse?"

"Well," replied the farmer, "I don't know just yet which one of them is the best; they're both handy looking. I think I like the brown." Then he went off into the house. As he reappeared a window was raised hurriedly, and a thin, clear voice called out, "John, you'd better take the grey one." The farmer began to look the animal over. "Gentlemen," he said, with affected indifference, "I believe I've changed my mind. I'll take the grey horse." "You most certainly will not!" cried the two men. "You will take the chicken."

SAVING A CITY.

A Band of Musicians Playing Popular Airs Did It.

It was in the year 1808, after a battle in the Spanish revolution of that year, and the streets of Madrid were filled with angry crowds that were bent on destroying everything and everyone. Suddenly an unknown man appeared at the city hall.

"Give me a band of musicians," he said, "and before nightfall I shall control all Madrid."

He must have been a man of rare personality to have been able to persuade the authorities in that dark hour to give him anything.

But he got the musicians, and went out with them to wander through the city. While they played, he sang popular street songs, or some old national air. When these lured the listeners, he mounted old boxes and told funny stories.

By nightfall peace reigned in the city, and the mob broke up and went home to bed. The man's name was Felipe Ducazel, and he was only twenty-two years old when he cleverly achieved this result.

We are told a deal about heroic things in saving countries by long, terrible rides at night, or by the sacrifice of oneself by dying in somebody's stead, but few of us hear of anyone who saved a town by laughter.

DOMESTIC LIFE OF PIRATES

LIVED UNDER LAWS ESTABLISHED BY THEMSELVES.

Freebooters Were Not Always Slitting Throats and Scuttling Other Men's Ships.

Outside of the spotlight which has been thrown on the professional activities of the old pirates of the West Indies was another interesting piratical life, their domestic life, which story and song have slighted.

Pirates were not always slitting throats and scuttling ships. Some times, like the gay freebooters of Penance, they "indulged in the felicity of unbounded domesticity."

The home station of most of the West Indian pirates was at the Island of Tortuga. There they lived under rude laws established by themselves and enforced in true republican style.

Tortuga had a regularly appointed government, as one may learn from the memoirs of John Esquemeling, a Dutch bond servant, who became a barber surgeon for various pirate bands. The most noted governor was M. de la Place, a renegade Frenchman. His major, or lieutenant governor, was Michael de Basco, a former soldier in Flanders and then retired after several successful piratical adventures.

The governor ruled the island as a despot. A few simple laws were enforced on all pirates. Debts must be paid. Friends of a murdered man might kill the slayer with impunity. Winners of fair fights went unpunished. Traitors were tortured. After three years slave had the privilege of joining a pirate band.

When a pirate captain planned an adventure he published the news in all the pirate retreats. Tortuga had its town crier. A date and gathering place were named. Also it was specified how much powder and shot each man must furnish.

On assembly day the prospective pirates thronged to the gathering place. The captain explained his project further. Then he inspected the recruits. All who had the required powder and shot and were well armed he accepted.

The next thing to do was to procure a ship. Usually the governor supplied that. Then the pirate band, now known as a society, discussed ways and means of provisioning the ship. The customary method was to sail in small boats to neighboring Spanish islands and steal enough hogs to provide meat. This was salted and stored away. Sometimes a gentle-hearted captain would pay the hog owners a small sum. Generally, however, they took what they wanted and the rancher considered his luck good if he escaped with his life.

The pirates now repaired to their stronghold and discussed the object of the adventure. The governor took part in this, he knowing the most probable sources of wealth. Having, as Esquemeling says, made diligent inquiries along that line, he meantime the ship-wright careened the vessels to be used, caulked and repaired them and fitted the rigging.

The last duty was the signing of articles. That was the compact which bound the pirates together until the adventure should end. It was first specified that all plunder should go to a common fund. That would be divided in equal parts. Each private mariner would get one part, the captain six parts and other officers in proportion. From 100 to 150 pieces of eight were set aside for the shipwright. The barber-surgeon was given about 250 pieces of eight as salary and funds to furnish a medicine chest. The pirates paid extra for whatever barber work they did.

Another important item was a schedule of remunerations for wounds. The following one generally was adopted:

Loss of right arm, 600 pieces of eight.

Loss of left arm, 500 pieces of eight.

Loss of right leg, 500 pieces of eight.

Loss of left leg, 600 pieces of eight.

Loss of an eye or finger, 100 pieces of eight.

Loss of both eyes, 800 pieces of eight.

This was paid from the common fund before the shares were declared. A wounded man had the option of taking one slave in lieu of each 100 pieces of eight. Boys drew one half share because it was their duty to scuttle and fire captured ships, a somewhat dangerous task.

In private life pirates were "very civil and charitable." Esquemeling writes, "so that if anyone wants what another has, with great willingness they give it one to another."

By strict attention to duty and application a pirate might work himself up to high command. The pirate surgeon tells of one Roche Brasiliano who, "being at a stand how to get his living, he entered himself into a society of pirates, where he served as a private man-of-war for some time, and behaved himself so well he was beloved and respected by all.

Such traits soon won him the title of vice admiral. He had one fondness which brought down a reproof from the governor of Tortuga. He took great pleasure in roasting Spaniards on wooden spits. The governor held that this violated piratical law. It was all right to roast a few Spaniards that way, but some should be saved for slaves. The governor won his point.

When an adventure was over the pirates made for their retreat as soon as the spoils had been divided. Then, until their money was gone, they lived a gay life. Sometimes a successful pirate would spend 9,000 or 3,000 pieces of eight a night in the Tortuga taverns. The tavernkeepers always raised the price of drinks when a party of pirates returned from a successful cruise.

In a few weeks all their wealth would be gone. Then the bankrupt pirates would seek a grubstake. If he were a brave pirate and known for having successful some tavernkeeper would supply him with food until another society was formed. Then the tavernkeeper would enter the pirate in the ranks, supplying the latter with arms, clothing, and half for a profited share of the loot. Quite a number of prudent pirates retired after a few successful cruises and gathered more wealth in the safer occupation of professional grubstaker. It was not unusual for some person to grubstake a dozen or more of a pirate crew.

After a few years in that occupation a retired pirate would end his associations with the freebooters and go to Virginia and become a respected planter, or to New England and set up a trading house. Esquemeling says it was quite common for men to do that.

Henry Morgan had a working agreement with Virginia, Louisiana and New England merchants. They financed his early adventures in return for the privilege of buying his loot at a low figure. Quite like the modern burglar, the pirate got the least money of anyone connected with his profession. Thus a shipload of cocoa was sold for one-seventh of its value to M. de la Place, who in turn sold it to Boston merchants for one half value.

PRINCE AND PAINTER.

The Latter Received an Apology From the Former for an Insult.

Audacity irresistibly attracts us, and the man of strong, original character is an object of universal interest.

In the economy of his household, James Northcote, the English portrait painter, was sordid, yet lords and ladies met a few assembled in his ill-furnished, ill-arranged and ill-kept studio when an excessively popular young actor sat to him. The favorite was conveyed by the Duke of Clarence (afterward William IV.) to Argyll Place in his own carriage, and his Royal Highness lingered to see the progress of the work and probably to study the painter.

"The loose gown in which he painted," says one of Northcote's biographers, "was principally composed of shreds and patches, and might perchance be half a century old; his white hair was sparingly bestowed on each side, and his cranium was entirely bald."

The royal visitor, standing behind him while he painted, first gently lifted, or rather twitched the collar of the gown, which Northcote resented by suddenly turning and expressing his displeasure by a frown, on which his Royal Highness, touching the professor's gray locks, said:

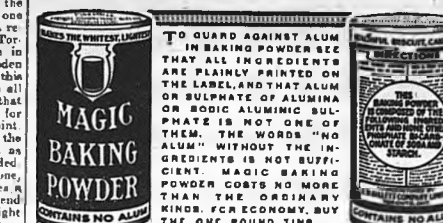
"You don't devote much time to the toilet, I perceive."

"Sir," the painter instantly replied, "I never allow anyone to take personal liberties with me. You are the first that ever presumed to do so, and I beg your Royal Highness to recollect that I am in my own house."

The artist resumed his painting; the prince stood silent for a moment or so, then opened the door, and went away. The royal carriage, however, had not arrived, and the rain was falling; the princes returned, borrowed an umbrella, and departed.

"Dear Mr. Northcote," said one of the ladies, "I fear you have offended his Royal Highness."

"Madam," said the painter, "I am the offended party."



The next day, about noon, Mr. Northcote was alone, when a gentle tap was heard, the studio door opened, and in walked the prince.

"Mr. Northcote," he said, "I am come to return your sister's umbrella: I brough it myself, that I might have an opportunity of saying that yesterday I thoughtlessly took an unbecoming liberty with you, which you properly resented. I really am angry with myself, and I hope you will forgive me, and think no more of it."

"And what did you say?" inquired a friend to whom the painter told the story.

"Say!" repeated Northcote. "What could I say? I only bowed: he might see what I felt. I could at that moment have sacrificed my life for him. Such a prince is worthy to be a king."

The prince afterward, in his blaff manner, said, "He's an honest, independent little old fellow."

THE AGED KICKED TO DEATH

MORE LIGHT ON ATROCITIES BY GERMANS.

Commission Instituted by French Government Issues Its Report—Murder and Revolting Crimes.

Further light on the atrocities perpetrated by German soldiers on non-combatants is given in the report presented by the commission instituted by the French Government with a view to investigating acts committed by the Germans in violation of international law. All the evidence before the commission was taken on oath and supported by photographs and wherever it has been possible to give the Germans the benefit of the doubt they have received it.

The commissioners consisted of M M Georges Payelle, First President of the Court des Cumptes; Armand Mollard, Minister Plenipotentiary; Georges Maringer, Counsellor of State, and Edmond Paillot, Counsellor at the Court of Appeal.

"Never has a war carried on between civilized nations assumed the savage and ferocious character of the one which at this moment is being waged on our soil by an implacable enemy. Pillage, rape, arson and murder are the common practice of our enemies," says the report.

Aged Kicked to Death.

The massacres at Luneville, Gerbeviller, Nomeny and Senlis afford terrible proof of this assertion. Villagers were torn from their homes and marched off into captivity into Germany. Those who by their age or infirmity fell by the roadside were bayonetted or kicked to death. In many instances women and children were placed as screens in front of the German troops during the fighting.

Buried Son's Body.

At Gerbeviller, 20 out of 475 houses remain habitable and 100 persons have disappeared. Some were taken to the fields and executed, others were assassinated in their homes or shot down as they fled from the flames. Here two of the most horrible crimes were committed. The Germans entered a house, took away the 36-year-old son, who was wearing a Red Cross brassard, tied his hands behind his back, shot him in the street and then returned and fetched his 70-year-old father and mother. They saw their son stretched on the ground. As the body still moved the German poured petrol upon it and set it alight in the presence of the terrified mother.

Family Murdered.

The village of Revigny, in the department of the Meuse, was the scene of a terrible drama. At the commencement of the fire Madame X. took refuge in the cellar. M. and Mme. Admot, together with these latter and their four children aged 11, 5, 4, and one year. A few days afterwards the bodies of these unfortunate people were discovered in the middle of a pool of blood. Admot had been shot, Mme. X had her breast and right arm cut off, the little girl of eleven had a foot severed, the little boy of five had his throat cut."

Revolting Crimes.

The following details of rapine and murder, arson and other abominable crimes are given in the report: "At Conflommiers a soldier came into the house of Madame X. on September 6 and sent her husband away on some pretext. Then, in spite of the fact that two small children were present, he tried to rape the young woman. Her husband, when he heard her cries, rushed back, but was hit on the head with a rifle and his wife had to suffer the consummation of the outrage. In the same way Madame X. and Madamt Z. at Saneylez-Provins were the victims of similar outrages. The former was forced to submit to the will of a soldier with a revolver at her throat; the second was outraged in the presence of her little daughter, aged 3. At St. Denis-les-Rebais on September 7, at Chlan raped Madame X, while her mother-in-law, powerless to intervene, endeavored to keep her grandson, aged 9, from this revolting sight."

This is the official report of only a few of the atrocities committed by the army that hoped to spread its culture among the nations of the world.

UNIVERSITY BASE HOSPITAL.

Its Needs Set Forth by Mrs. McPhedran.

The following letter from Mrs. McPhedran, the convenor of the Sick Fund of the Ontario Red Cross Society, will interest many readers of this paper who are engaged in charitable work or who may be able to devote a little time to aiding in the equipment of the base hospital, which is being sent to the front very soon by the medical faculty of the University of Toronto:

151 Bloor St. West,
Toronto, March 25th.

Dear Sir,—Will you grant me the hospitality of your columns for a few words regarding supplies for the University of Toronto Base Hospital? We know that there are many graduates, men and women, throughout Canada, who are intensely interested in this undertaking, and we ask and need every one's assistance in order that we may bring the equipment to a successful issue.

It has been suggested that groups organized for work throughout the province should turn their organizations over to University Hospital work for at least some weeks.

As sheets, shirts, pillow slips, pyjamas, bed jackets, etc., are needed by thousands, it is hoped that some societies may make offers such as the following: "We will make one hundred shirts for the University Base Hospital during the next month." Mrs. Leah Miller, the convenor of the Work Committee, will be glad to hear from any who are willing to help in this way.

May I say a few words in regard to socks. The impression seems to have got abroad that our men will not require heavy socks during the summer. This is a mistake. None but heavy woollen socks are ever worn by soldiers in the field. When the wounded are sufficiently recovered to again take their places in the firing line new outfits of clothing are needed to replace those ruined by mud and blood, most of which must be burned when the men come in. For this we shall require many hundreds of socks to supplement those supplied by the Government.

This hospital, officially known as No. 4, is essentially our hospital. Let us then send it out well equipped, a worthy expression of our industry, our patriotism, and our love of humanity.

JEAN McPHEDRAN,
Convenor of Ontario Red Cross Society Sock Fund.

NERVOUS DISEASES IN THE SPRING

Cured by Toning the Blood and Strengthening the Nerves

It is the opinion of the best medical authorities, after long observation, that nervous diseases are more common and more serious in the spring than at any other time of the year. Vital changes in the system, after long winter months, may cause much more trouble than the familiar spring weakness and weariness from which most people suffer as the result of indoor life in poorly ventilated and often overheated buildings. Official records prove that in April and May neuralgia, St. Vitus dance, epilepsy and other forms of nerve trouble are at their worst, and that then, more than any other time, a blood-making, nerve-restoring tonic is needed.

The antiquated custom of taking purgatives in the spring is useless, for the system really needs strengthening, while purgatives only gallop through the bowels, leaving you weaker. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are the best medicine, for they actually make the new, rich, red blood that feeds the starved nerves, and thus cure the many forms of nervous disorders. They cure also such other forms of spring troubles as headaches, poor appetite, weakness in the limbs, as well as remove unsightly pimples and eruptions. In fact they unfailingly bring new health and strength to weak, tired and depressed men, women and children.

Sold by all medicine dealers or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

WHAT MOTHERS SAY OF BABY'S OWN TABLETS

Once a mother has used Baby's Own Tablets for her little ones she will use no other medicine. She quickly realizes the Tablets are an absolutely safe remedy and one that will give sure results. Concerning them Mrs. R. L. Wright, Pennabit, Sask., writes: "I have used Baby's Own Tablets for my three babies and think so much of them that I always keep them in the house." The Tablets are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Blind from Birth, Suddenly Sees.

A veritable miracle has come to Miss Maud Emerson Lincoln, of Marblehead, Massachusetts, who, after twenty-one years of life in almost total darkness, suddenly regained the use of her eyes. Practically blind from her birth, 21 years ago, she now sees clearly. In an instant, one early afternoon, unexpectedly, as she was about household duties, she felt something suddenly snap in her eyes and the veil that had darkened her blue eyes throughout her youth, was swept away and sight came first to one eye and then to the other. She had always been able to distinguish between light and darkness, but to-day she can see as well as any normal being. When the girl began to see, she almost fell into nervous prostration. Her whole nervous system had a reaction from the miracle. The sight of people frightened her, the sight of food was strange, and she could not eat; everywhere she turned she saw things she had never seen before. Miss Lincoln was taken to an eye specialist to determine whether her regained sight is permanent. She plans to make up for her enforced lack of education and is real happy on account of the "miracle."

How a Sick Woman Can Regain Health

READ THIS VERY CAREFULLY.

"For years I was thin and delicate. I lost color and was easily tired; a yellow pallor, pimples and blotches on my face were not only mortifying to my feelings, but because I thought my skin would never look nice again I grew despondent. Then my appetite failed. I grew very weak. Various remedies, pills, tonics and tablets I tried without permanent benefit. A visit to my sister put into my hands a box of Dr. Hamilton's Pills. She placed reliance upon them, and now that they have made me a well woman I would not be without them whatever they might cost. I found Dr. Hamilton's Pills by their mild yet searching action very suitable to the delicate character of a woman's nature. They never once griped me, yet they established regularity. My appetite grew keen—my blood red and pure—heavy rings under my eyes disappeared and to-day my skin is as clear and unwrinkled as when I was a girl. Dr. Hamilton's Pills did it all."

The above straightforward letter from Mrs. J. Y. Todd, wife of a well-known miller in Regerville, is proof sufficient that Dr Hamilton's Pills are a wonderful woman's medicine. Use no other pill but Dr. Hamilton's, 25c. per box. All dealers or The Catarrhozone Co., Kingston, Ontario.

Slightly Misunderstood.

Railway Official (breaking the news gently to the wife of a commercial traveller)—"Ahem' madam, be calm. Your husband has met with a slight—that is to say, one of the front wheels of a passenger locomotive struck him on the cheek and——"

Wife—"Well, sir, you needn't come round here in order to collect damages. You won't get a penny from me. If your company can't keep its property out of danger, it'll have to take the consequences. You should have your engine insured."

Hard on the Judge.

Mr. Arthur H. Engelbach, in his collection of anecdotes of the Bench tells this story of Lord Braxford who was among the last of the Scotch judges who rigidly adhered to the broad Scotch dialect:

"Hae ye ony counsel, mon?" he said to Maurice Hargot, when placed at the Bar.

"No," was the reply.

"Do ye wan to hae any appointit?" continued the judge.

"No," said Margot; "I only want an interpreter to make me understand what your lordship says."

Many a woman who doesn't know her own mind gives her husband pieces of it.

A few months in school teaches some children how little their parents know.

Separate School Teacher Speaks

TELLS OF THE GOOD DODD'S KIDNEY PILLS HAVE DONE.

She Had No Faith in Them. But the Results and Health Obtained Convinced Her.

Grates Cove, Trinity Bay, Nfld., March 29th (Special).—Among the thousands in Newfoundland who pin their faith to Dodd's Kidney Pills is Miss Mary Bridget Whelan, teacher in the Roman Catholic School here.

"I am exceedingly grateful to Dodd's Kidney Pills." Miss Whelan states in an interview. "I was very much run down in health. Close confinement to my work brought on my trouble.

"Reading of the many cures by Dodd's Kidney Pills I began to use them and I must confess with very little faith.

"Before I had taken one box I was not only cured but my strength was growing rapidly, and I felt a great improvement in every way."

Miss Whelan gives the real reason of the popularity of Dodd's Kidney Pills. They do not cure the ailment aimed at at the expense of some other part of the body. They build up health all over the body. They do this by curing the Kidneys. Cured Kidneys mean pure blood.

Chest Colds and Hoarseness Quickly Rubbed Away

"Nerviline" Gives Speedy Relief and Cures Over Night.

Got a cold?

Is your voice raspy—is your chest congested or sore?

If so, you are the very person that Nerviline will cure in a jiffy.

Nerviline is strong and penetrating. It sinks right into the tissues, takes out inflammation and soreness, destroys colds in a truly wonderful way. Rub Nerviline over the chest—rub on lots of it, and watch that tightness disappear. Nerviline won't blister, it sinks in too fast—doesn't simply stay on the surface like a thick, oily liniment would. If the throat is raspy and sore, rub it well outside with Nerviline, and use Nerviline as a gargle diluted with warm water. Just one or two treatments like this and your voice and throat will be quickly normal again.

Just think of it—for forty years the largest used family medicine in this country—Nerviline must be good, must quickly relieve and cure a hundred ills that befall every family. Try it for earache, toothache, coughs, colds, sore chest, hoarseness and muscular pains in every part of the body. Large family size bottle 50c.; trial size 25c, at all dealers.

BENEFITS OF IRRIGATION.

When Sir William Van Horne said many years ago that the C.P.R. by undertaking the work of irrigation east of Calgary, would make the wilderness to blossom like the rose, he was derided, but to-day this prophecy may be said to be a literal fact. At any rate, millions of acres have not only been reclaimed by the company, but the whole district has been so improved and beautified that there is now a general clamor for irrigation in sections which are still untouched. Deputations have gone to Ottawa to stir the Government into undertaking the work outside the proprietarial limits of the C.P.R., on the lands which seem to require this treatment to produce similar results to those so gratifying and profitable on the C.P.R. lands.

As one result of this demand on the part of the people of Southern Alberta, Professor Fairfield, superintendent of the Dominion Experimental Farm, Lethbridge, convinced farmers that with irrigation production will not only be greatly increased, but permanent homes established on the prairie, which can be rendered naturally beautiful when irrigation works are available. The professor laid great stress on growing alfalfa corn, which meant more fodder for live stock, more fertility of soil, improvement to all crops. Resolutions were passed asking the Minister of the Interior to carry out irrigation works, or to arrange for an extension of the C.P.R. system

A Point About Clocks.

How is it that clocks are often made to go eight days? Why not seven, or nine, or any other number? Of course, if made seven-day clocks they would run down once a week. It is easy to remember to wind the clock every Saturday or Monday, as the case may be, and the eight-day clock would, therefore, have a day in hand, it would never run down if wound once a week. The same applies to watches, which are usually made to go for 30 hours. Wound regularly once a day (every 24 hours) they will not stop.

To whom it may concern: This is to certify that I have used MINARD'S LINIMENT myself as well as prescribed it in my practice where a liniment was required and have never failed to get the desired effect.

C. A. KING, M.D.

Burdens.

We are told in a good old book that we should carry one another's burdens, and again that every man should bear his own burden. It seems a contradiction, but it is so only in seeming. There are physical burdens or imperfections that every man must bear if they are sent to him; there are hereditary tendencies which no man can uproot for another; there are the circumstances of life into which a man or woman is born. These, everyone must bear for himself; but there are the burdens of poverty, of mental darkness, of spiritual blight, of loneliness, of heart hunger; burdens of over-work, of no work at all, and corresponding lack of money, which we can all help to bear for one another. It is said that there are none so ready to help the poor as the poor themselves. That, no doubt, is very true, but there are many who are not poor who would be none the worse of a kind word—a helping hand over one of the stiles of life.

Too many sermons are aimed at pocket books instead of at hearts.

QUEER SCISSORS FISH.

Jaws are Nearly Four Times as Long as the Head.

Another strange marine animal of the fish tribe has just been obtained from the Mediterranean Sea. Somewhere in the neighborhood of a mile and a quarter deep. It was caught by a deep-sea dredging ship. The fish is about 18 inches long and as deep black as Cerberus. It has been dubbed by the seamen who carried it to the Louvre the "scissors fish," because its head in appearance is half way between that of an alligator and of a pair of large shears.

The unusual disposition of the jaws and the double-blade mouth gives it an odd appearance. The jaws are nearly four times as long as the head of the fish. From the snout to the brain is four inches, while the two jaws look all the world like the blades of a scissors, and slight tooth-like edges, invisible but easily felt, run all the way along them. The mouth itself is a vast tunnel, of which the body is a long drawn out extension. In this pouch food is prepared for assimilation.

The fins, for swimming purposes, are placed near the back; there are no belly fins. The tail of the fish is like the tail of a monkey, round and serpentine. It is not flat, as in other fishes. Its name to be properly pronounced requires several sets of false teeth and a dozen tongues. It is eurysphaynx pelecanoides.

The New Postage Tax

A war tax of one cent has been imposed on each letter and postcard mailed in Canada for delivery in Canada, the United States or Mexico, and on each letter mailed in Canada for delivery in the United Kingdom and British possessions generally, and wherever the two cent rate applies, to become effective on and from the 15th April, 1915.

This war tax is to be prepaid by the senders by means of a war stamp for sale by postmasters and other postage stamp vendors.

Wherever possible, stamps on which the words "War Tax" have been printed should be used for prepayment of the war tax, but should ordinary postage stamps be used for this purpose, they will be accepted.

This war stamp or additional for war purposes should be affixed to the upper right hand portion of the address side of the envelope or postcard, close to the regular postage so that it may be readily cancelled at the same time as the postage.

In the event of failure on the part of the sender through oversight or negligence to prepay the war tax on each letter or postcard above specified, such a letter or postcard will be sent immediately to the nearest branch dead letter office. It is essential that postage on all classes mail matter should be prepaid by means of ordinary postage stamps. The war tax stamp will not be accepted in any case for the prepayment of postage.

High Wages, Small Profits

There is something wrong. A few discontented farm laborers have worked for a few "nigger-driving" farmers. They have given all farmers a bad name, and the farmers in turn have criticized hired men severely. All farmers are not slave-drivers, neither are all farm laborers good-for-nothing loafers. The right kind of farm laborer is worthy of his hire, and the considerate, careful, systematic farmer is just as good an employer and no more exacting than the captain of industry in the city. He may not have as much money as has his privileged city brother, but he has never had the same opportunities to get it easy and to turn legislation his way as the city big-business man has had. Farmers cannot compete satisfactorily in the labor market with the bigger industries which enjoy special privileges. They are willing to pay all they can, and according to profits one year with another, pay a higher wage than any other class of employers in Canada to-day. The situation remains unchanged. Unemployed are fed by the cities while the farmer requires help, but the unemployed very often sneer at farm work. These are not made of the same stuff that good farmers and good farm laborers can boast of. The farm needs real men—men of strength, men of ambition, men of brains. To these it offers an opportunity.—Farmers' Advocate.

—The Liberals submitted eleven amendments to the third reading of the measure of Hon. W. J. Hanna for amendment of the Ontario License Act. All eleven were defeated in the Legislature by the vote of 54 to 23. The amendments asked that the Government: 1 Close all bars and clubs at seven o'clock during the period of the war. 2 Close all bars and clubs at 8 o'clock in the evening. 3 Close all bars and clubs at 9 o'clock in the evening. 4 Close all bars and clubs at 10 o'clock in the evening. 5 Close all bars, clubs and shops on Saturday at 1 o'clock. 6 Add New Year's to the list of prohibited days. 7 Make local option county-wide. 8 Substitute majority vote for three-fifths in local option contests. 9 Strike out clause making it necessary for municipalities in which a vote for license reduction has been defeated to wait three years before the submission of similar vote again. 10 Add shops and clubs to the bars in the clause authorizing the board to prohibit the sale of liquor to any particular class of persons. 11 Give the Board of Commissioners power to appoint its own inspectors and officers instead of their being appointed by the Government, as under the Government bill.

Address and Presentation

The many friends and neighbors of Mr and Mrs J G Clarke gathered at their home on Tuesday evening, March 29th, and presented Mr and Mrs Clarke with a couch and two chairs, and Master Howard with a camera. Mr Clarke, though taken wholly by surprise, made a neat response, thanking the donors for their handsome gifts which to himself and wife would be beyond value. He never thought he was much of a fellow himself, but always knew he had a good wife. An appropriate address was given by the chairman, Mr R J Nelson, also by Mr R C Teeple of Greenock and Mr D McBeath of Elderslie, as well as songs by Messrs Jas Begg and E Nicholson, making a most enjoyable evening for all. Following is the address:

Mr and Mrs Clarke and Master Howard: Knowing of your intended departure from our neighborhood, we, some of your friends and neighbors, thought this a most opportune time to wish you all success and prosperity in your new home. It is not our intention to express regrets at losing life-long members of our community—we feel that you must know that—but rather to spend together a social evening for Auld Lang Syne, and to remind you in Tam of Auld Lang Syne in Paisley will you accept these gifts as an inadequate means of expressing both our regrets at your departure and our best wishes that your life in Tam may prove happy and prosperous? In bidding you good-bye we include the hope that you will return occasionally to revisit your friends in Greenock, and that, despite the new ones you are bound to make, you will cherish memories of your old friends when you are in your new home.

THE LATE RICHARD MILLS

It is our sad duty to chronicle the death of Mr Richard Mills, one of our highly respected pioneers, who passed to his rest on March 28 h. at the residence of his son James, in the 90th year of his age. The subject of this sketch was born in Northumberland, England, in 1825, where he spent his boyhood and early manhood and learned the blacksmith's trade. There he married Miss Agnes Laidlaw, and a few years after left England with his young wife and two children and came to New York where his brother James lived. About 1854 he came to Bruce Tp and took up lot 24, con 9, where he and a little colony from England started to hew out their future homes. About a year after settling down to hard work Mr Mills suffered a double calamity in his household. One of his children died, and in company with kind neighbors he walked to Baie dure to procure the funeral requisites, and during their absence the wife and mother died very suddenly, leaving one boy, Thomas. Mr Mills then rented his farm and went to Fergus, where he worked at the blacksmithing. It was there he met and married Miss Margaret Hayes and again started farming on his lot on con 9, where he lived many years very happily with his estimable wife and children. They were consistent members of the Presbyterian church here and helped very largely to build it. Mr Mills possessed many sterling qualities. Being a total abstainer from either spirits or tobacco, he was a great temperance worker. He was a good public speaker, a gifted singer and violinist, and took an active part in any movement that had for its object an uplift. For many years he taught in the Sabbath school. In politics he was a Liberal. The family who mourn the loss of a devoted father are Thomas of Fergus; William, of Fergus, ex-M.P.; James on con 10, and Mrs Wm Porter, con 6. Mrs Mills predeceased her husband 27 years ago. The funeral to Willow Creek cemetery was largely attended. Mr and Mrs Thos Mills, of Fergus, were among those present.

ADAM JOHNSTON

Anaemic condition of the blood was the cause of the demise of Mr. Adam Johnston, of Ellengowan, on March 29th. He had been ailing for a considerable time, but was himself always quite hopeful of recovery. The deceased was born and raised at Ellengowan, being the youngest son of the late Adam Johnston. For quite a number of years he was employed with the Massey-Harris Co., of Brantford. He married Miss Jean Munro, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Jas. Munro, Paisley, who survives him. Of a quiet, but kindly disposition, the deceased is very highly spoken of by acquaintances, and his death at the early age of 35 years is deplored by all. Mr. Donald Johnston and Miss Johnston, of Ellengowan, are brother and sister of deceased. Two other brothers, Andrew and Alexander, also another sister, live in the west.

JOHN CLARK

The late John Clark, who passed away at his home in Cargill on March 27th, had been a great sufferer, and death was in his case, indeed, a relief from bodily pain. His troubles began with an attack of pleurisy seven years ago, and for five years he was wholly incapacitated for work, owing to a tubercular affection of the bone. He was in his 58th year. Mr. Clark was a son of the late Alex Clark, and was born on the home farm, lot 24, Elora Road, Brant, where he was brought up and continued to live until removing to Cargill last fall. He was very much respected in the community, and there was every prospect of a successful and useful life before him. He is survived by his widow (nee Miss Harriet Napper), and a young daughter, for whom every sympathy is felt in their and bereavement. These brothers and three sisters also mourn his loss, viz: Charles and William, in Hamilton; Thomas, of Prince Albert, Sask.; Mrs. G. Hood, Elora road south; Mrs. A. Breed, of Harding, Man.; Mrs. D. Willoughby, of Brant Tp.

—If you have a guest at your home, are going out of town for a visit, or know of any interesting news, kindly let us hear from you. We will always appreciate such favors.

—Mr. John Joynt is the new reeve of Lucknow. An election was necessary after the death of Reeve J. D. Murdoch. Mr. Joynt won by 40 majority in a contest with Mr. J. G. Anderson.

HIS HEALTH IN A TERRIBLE STATE

"Fruit-a-tives" Healed His Kidneys and Cured Him

HAGUERSVILLE, ONT., AUG. 26th. 1913.

"About two years ago, I found my health in a very bad state. My Kidneys were not doing their work and I was all run down in condition. I felt the need of some good remedy, and having seen "Fruit-a-tives" advertised, I decided to try them. Their effect, I found more than satisfactory.

Their action was mild and the result all that could be expected.

My Kidneys resumed their normal action after I had taken upwards of a dozen boxes, and I regained my old-time vitality. Today, I am enjoying the best health I have ever had".

MRS. JAS. McNEILL

After gradually failing in physical strength for three or four years, the last one of those who were the old residents along the Elora road, north of Paisley, was on March 29th called to mingle with the throngs on the other shore. Mrs. McNeill came to Elderslie with her husband and young family from Toronto Tp over forty years ago. She lived on the farm until after Mr. McNeill's death fifteen years ago, when she removed to Paisley. In her declining years the deceased had the most faithful and loving attention of her only daughter, Miss Celena. Other members of the family are three sons—Archie and Albert in Vancouver, B.C., and Alexander in Southampton. The funeral service was conducted by Rev. G. C. Little, B.A., assisted by Rev. E. J. McEwen.

Good-Bye, Says Pat

A sergeant in the ——th Regiment of British Infantry, who was very short, was drilling a squad of recruits, among whom was an Irishman who was very tall. The sergeant had several times spoken to him about not carrying his head erect. At last, in desperation, the sergeant went up to him, and, reaching up, placed his head in the desired position. "Is this where I have to keep my head all the time?" inquired Pat. "Certainly it is!" replied the sergeant. "Thea, begorra, sergeant," says Pat, "I'll have to say good-bye to you, for I'll never see you any more!"

RAISING HEIFER CALVES

The records of two herds of dairy cows owned by two neighbors furnish a striking example of the utility of dairy records to the man who really wants to build up a good herd. The first man who has been cow testing for four years and has selected his cows carefully, studying their various preferences and capacities, each one as an individual. He raises heifers from his best cows; four two-year-olds gave last year an average of 7,144 pounds of milk, while his herd of ten gave an average of 3,059 pounds of milk and 250 pounds of fat.

The neighbor considers it simpler to buy just what cows he can, he does not raise any calves. Last year his nine cows, all upwards of six years old, except two heifers, gave an average of only 4,240 pounds of milk. This is only just about one-half as much milk per cow as in the first herd. The best cow gave only 6,355 pounds, less than the average of the four heifers in the first herd. He has nothing on which to start building up a good dairy herd, unless it be his judgment in "picking a winner," which judgment, by the way, does not appear to be of A1 quality. The owner of the first herd has the advantage of four years of dairy records, practically indispensable to the real dairy farmer, besides mature judgment in handling cows to better advantage. Cow testing pays.

HOW GERMANS KNOW THEIR BEARINGS

The following story is told by an officer who was in Antwerp before its occupation by the Germans, and was published in The Liverpool Post: "In company with an officer of the Belgian Army he entered a little roadside inn and called for some beer. On the walls of what we would call the bar parlor were a number of large framed advertisements among them being one of somebody's lager beer—needless to say, made in Germany. The advertisement caught the eye of the Belgian officer, who rose exclaiming, "Hol another of them." With his walking stick he smashed the glass and tore the advertisement out, thrusting it down back upwards before his British comrade, who saw to his amazement a very perfect map of the country round Antwerp on a scale of six inches to the mile. The Belgian officer informed the Englishman that when the war began there was not a public house in the district without one of those advertisements, and when the invaders lost their bearings their officers all knew where to find a chart not far away. The innkeeper was a Belgian patriot above suspicion, who, of course, knew nothing about the map. He informed the officers that the advertisement in question had been delivered to him nine years previously by the German brewers, and had been hanging in his parlor ever since.

WOMAN SUFFERED TEN YEARS

From Female Ills—Restored to Health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Belleville, N.S., Canada.—"I doctored for ten years for female troubles and did not get well. I read in the paper about Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and decided to try it. I write now to tell you that I am cured. You can publish my letter as a testimonial." —Mrs. SYLVENUS BARNES, Belleville, Nova Scotia, Canada.

Another Woman Recovers.

Auburn, N. Y.—"I suffered from nervousness for ten years, and had such organic pains that sometimes I would lie in bed four days at a time, could not eat or sleep and did not want anyone to talk to me or bother me at all. Sometimes I would suffer for seven hours at a time. Different doctors did the best they could for me until four months ago I began giving Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound a trial and now I am in good health."—Mrs. WILLIAM H. GILL, No. 11 Pleasant Street, Auburn, New York.

The above are only two of the thousands of grateful letters which are constantly being received by the Pinkham Medicine Company of Lynn, Mass., which show clearly what great things Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound does for those who suffer from woman's ills.

If you want special advice write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. (confidential) Lynn, Mass. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

It Pays to Use Good Paint

Protection and Beauty are the two great objects in painting. Paint that will peel or crack and let in moisture gives poor protection—and is a bad investment. Paint that has cheap colors which fade cannot give beauty—and is a bad investment. It costs no more to apply "High Standard" than poor paints, and it gives perfect protection and beauty. Lowe Brothers "High Standard" Liquid Paint sets in a close tight coat that gives perfect protection and long wear. Only fadeless colors are used, and you get lasting beauty.

That's why we sell and recommend "High Standard." We know it will give you best results.

Lowe Brothers HIGH STANDARD LIQUID PAINTS

Floor Varnish

There is a difference in varnishes for floor use. Lowe Brothers Durable Floor Varnish is very tough and elastic, does not easily scratch or mar, and resists hard wear and dampness.

Floor Paint

This is a strong, hard-drying paint for floors, boat decks and all places having hard wear, and is very durable. It comes in a variety of colors.

Mellotone

Mellotone is the most perfect wall finish. Its soft tints are very beautiful, and absolutely fadeless. It is also washable, and therefore sanitary, and lasts much longer than wallpaper or other finishes. More beautiful, more durable, more economical in the end. Ask for color cards.

Come in and let us help you with your painting and decorating problems.

How to Cook Asparagus.

Much has been written and said about the health-giving qualities of asparagus. Taking all these qualities for granted, here are some interesting ways of cooking this vegetable so that it may be served many times without palling on the most exacting and fastidious appetite.

Baked with Cheese.—Drain boiled asparagus and arrange the stalks neatly on a buttered baking dish. Fry a chopped onion in butter and pour this over the asparagus. Sprinkle over it bread crumbs and grated cheese and bake brown. The asparagus can be cut into one-inch lengths for this dish.

Fried Asparagus.—Boil the asparagus, drain it, dip each stalk in beaten egg and crumbs and fry in deep fat. Serve with cream sauce.

Creamed.—Cut a bunch or two of asparagus into one-inch lengths and boil until tender. Drain and put into rich white sauce, rather thick, for the asparagus contains water that thins it; heat thoroughly, season with salt and paprika and serve very hot.

In Rolls.—Remove the centre from stale, rather long, pointed rolls, and fry the rolls golden brown in deep fat. Drain on brown paper and keep hot. Cut a bunch of asparagus in the meantime into one-inch lengths, and boil until tender. Drain and put in a double boiler with a cupful of milk. Add the yolks of five eggs and stir until thick and smooth. Season with salt and a little grated nutmeg and pour into the hot rolls. White sauce may be used instead of the egg sauce if desired.

Baked Asparagus.—Cut asparagus into inch lengths and boil. Drain and put a layer in a buttered baking dish. Season with salt and pepper, dot with bits of butter, sprinkle with crumbs and finely minced boiled eggs. Add more asparagus and repeat in the order mentioned until the dish is filled. Have crumbs on top and bake brown.

Served Cold.—Boil until tender stalks of asparagus and drain them. Chill them and serve them with mayonnaise, with Hollandaise or with tartare sauce. It can also be served with a sauce of oil and vinegar, sprinkled with chopped cucumber pickle.

Boiled.—Boiled asparagus can be served with melted butter, pepper and salt either on toast or without it; with drawn butter or white sauce with a little hot cream poured over it or with melted butter and lemon juice.

Asparagus and Eggs.—Cut a bunch of asparagus into lengths of an inch or two and boil in salted water. Drain and put in a dish. Add butter, melted, and pepper, and then four well-beaten eggs. Cook in the oven until the eggs are set. Serve immediately, but before sending to the table garnish with minced parsley.

Asparagus in a Mold.—Mix a cupful of white sauce with a quarter of a cupful of chopped chicken or veal and a cupful of asparagus tips, boiled until tender and drained. Add four eggs, beaten well, and pour into a mold. Place the mold in a panful of hot water and cook in the oven until firm. Then turn out on a hot platter or dish and serve.

Try These Hints.

Mashed potatoes are fluffier if beaten with an egg-beater.

When making sponge cakes in patty tins, see that the oven is very hot.

When jelly will not set, add the juice of a lemon or some white vinegar.

Fasten a safety pin through the last stitch of crocheting, then it can not possibly "pull out."

Biscuits should always be started in a very hot oven, which can be cooled a little later on.

A bucket of dry lime placed in the centre of a room which is not being used will absorb all dampness.

To keep your linen which is not in everyday use from turning yellow, wrap it in a towel which has been blued.

When frying chickens or fish, to avoid the grease from spattering, sift in a tiny bit of flour just before putting them in.

It has been suggested that one of the best ways to darn stockings is to place the stocking over a bottle, tree or last, and then proceed to darn them.

For an egg custard take one egg, beat nicely; add two tablespoonfuls of sugar, 1½ cups of milk, one teaspoonful of vanilla or nutmeg; bake one-half hour.

To polish brass.—Brass polished with sweet oil and rottenstone will have a deep rich tone. The whiter, more brilliant tone is caused by acid polishes.

To clean white satin slippers rub the surface thread with a piece of white flannel dipped in spirits of wine. If but slightly soiled, clean with stale bread or art gum.

A good way of stiffening the bristles of hair brushes after washing is to dip them into a mixture of equal quantities of milk and water, and then dry before the fire.

A silk cap front for a baby's hat or bonnet is much better than a lace one. It does not crumple so quickly, or chafe the tender skin, while it is quite as cheap in the end.

While cool weather lasts, save water from potatoes and all other boiled vegetables, put in jars, stand in cool place; use to boil meat scraps or soup bone. It makes excellent soup.

Polished floors should be rubbed with a mixture of one-third raw linseed oil and two-thirds paraffin. Use it sparingly, or the polishing afterwards with a dry cloth will be a long business.

To save time cook enough oat meal for two or three mornings while you are cooking dinner and put in glass jar and keep in the refrigerator. In morning take out amount needed and mix with water.

When cooking oatmeal or any other article of food without a double boiler and food should scorch, set it immediately in a vessel of cold water about five or ten minutes, and the scorched taste and odor will disappear.

Do not throw away your celery tops or the stalks you consider too tough for table use. Put them in paper bags, tie string around top to keep out dust, and hang behind stove. When making soup use these dried celery stalks to flavor; large pieces may be strained out. It also makes potatoes more palatable when boiled with them.

CANINE CHARACTER.

Two Incidents Which Show His Great Intelligence.

"Nanook was a most independent dog, a thoroughly bad dog, a thief who had no shame in his thievery, but rather gloried in it," says the Rev. Hudson Stuck of one of his dogs in "Ten Thousand Miles with a Dog Sled." "If you left anything edible within his reach he regarded it as a challenge." Mr. Stuck continues:

There comes to me a ludicrous incident that concerned a companion of one winter journey. He had carefully prepared a lunch and had wrapped it neatly in paper, and had placed it on the sled while he put on his scarf. But in that moment Nanook took the package and was gone. Through the snow, over the brush, and in and out among the stumps the chase proceeded, until Nanook was caught. We recovered most of the paper, but the dog had wolfed the lunch as he ran.

Nanook's acquaintance with horses began in Fairbanks the first season I owned him, when he was a little more than two years old. I was staying at the hospital waiting for the winter. One of the mining magnates had imported a saddle horse, and as the mild days of that charming autumn still deferred the snow, he used to ride out past the hospital every day for a canter.

The dog had learned to lift the latch of the gate with his nose, and when I put a wedge above the latch for greater security, he learned also to circumvent that precaution. And whenever the horse and his rider passed, Nanook would open the gate and lead the whole pack in a wild pursuit that changed the canter to a run, and brought unnatural but mortifying remonstrance.

The rider had just passed and the dogs had pursued as usual, and I had rushed out and recalled them with difficulty. Nanook I had by the collar. I dragged him into the yard, shut the gate, put in the wedge, picked up a stick, and gave him a few sharp blows with it. Then flinging him off, I said, "Now, you stay in here. I'll give you a sound thrashing if you do that again." The moment I loosed his collar the dog went deliberately to the gate, stood on his hind legs while he pulled out the wedge with his teeth, lifted the latch with his nose, and swung open the gate. Then, standing in the opening, he turned round and said to me, "Bowwowwow." It was so pointed that a passerby, who had paused to watch the proceedings, said to me, "Well, you know now what he thinks of you. That's the dog-gondest dog I ever saw!"

SOME ODD FACTS.

According to a British scientist color blindness is hereditary, but is transmitted by women to their children, never by men.

A bubbling fountain for horses, in which the water is turned on by an animal stepping upon a platform surrounding it, has been invented.

A wheelbarrow has been patented which is emptied by resting the legs on the ground and pressing down the handles.

New shackles for convicts permit a man to walk as usual but lock should he bend his knees far enough to try to run.

A New York ornithologist has invented a collapsible galvanized iron bird house than can be taken apart for cleaning.

A back rest for motorcyclists, to be fastened around the waist from the handle bars of a machine, is an English novelty.

A gun which fires a six-pound projectile without recoil has been invented for use on aeroplanes.

CLOSEST SHAVE ON RECORD

SYDNEY WRIGHT'S NARROW ESCAPE FROM DEATH.

Lost His Balance, Fell Ten Stories and Escaped With a Few Scratches.

There is a young man in Sydney, Australia, to-day—Sydney Wright, a builder's laborer—who recently experienced one of the most remarkable escapes from death ever chronicled. He was fixing a scaffold on the tenth story of a very lofty building in Bridge street, Sydney, when he lost his balance and went hurtling down toward the roadway far below. Everybody expected to see him dashed to atoms, but by marvellous good fortune, after falling 50 feet, he dropped into a cluster of telephone wires, caught hold of them, scrambled along to a pole and slid down to the pavement, says the Wide World Magazine.

After the narrow escape he actually went back to his work, but presently "came over dizzy," and accompanied by a policeman, walked to the Sydney hospital. Here it was found that, apart from a few cuts and bruises on legs, arms and head, and a general feeling of shakiness, he was quite uninjured and in no need of medical treatment. In a very few days, in fact, Wright was fit for work again.

This astonishing affair was fully reported by the Sydney Evening News, which interviewed Wright at his home in Great Buckingham Street, Redfern, and other well-known journals. Wright's own story of his remarkable experience is as follows:

"It was my first day on the job. I'd been out of work for a month—drifting round Sydney for four weeks looking for a billet—and on the very day I got a start this hoist mess happened.

Up Ten Stories.

"I went to work first thing in the morning. It was a lofty new building in Bridge Street, being erected for Messrs. Birt & Co. I tackled the job with a will, for it was quite a change after being idle for so long. In the afternoon I was put on erecting scaffolds. I was up ten stories—about 225 feet above the footpath—and before I got busy I had to look down into the street. I noticed the telephone wires that later saved my life, and it occurred to me, just in a casual sort of way, that they might come in handy if a man happened to fall. I little thought that before very long I should be dashed down headfirst toward those same wires.

"Well, I was up on the scaffold, with my back turned toward the street and had started to nail a board onto an upright, when I realised that the post wasn't firm enough. I took it between my knees and was about to hammer at it, when all of a sudden the top of the post shifted outward and I lost my balance.

"I couldn't do anything to save myself; I just had to go over. Fortunately, however, I kept my head. I dropped my hammer and grabbed at the post as a forlorn hope, but it came with me, and the next instant I felt myself going. I was on the outside edge of the scaffold, and as I slipped back into space I thought again of those telephone wires far below.

"They offered a bare chance of life. I knew that if I dropped straight down I should be smashed to pieces. But those wires might break my fall.

Turned a Somersault.

"All this passed through my mind in the very act of falling, and as I toppled backward from the scaffold I pushed off from the edge with my toes in the hope of reaching them. At the same time I twisted myself around so that I could see where I was going, and hurled the post that I had been clutching into the street. These violent movements caused me to turn a complete somersault in the air, but I was now looking where I was going, and that contented me. I wouldn't have liked to have dropped down with my face toward the sky. I had a sort of idea I could pick out where to all. You may not believe it, but I had my wits practically everything that was going on around me. I could see the workmen on the building. I noticed the people walking in the streets and I could hear them about me all the time and knew distinctly out.

"What did the fall feel like? It was wonderful—glorious! I really couldn't describe it; it was such a strange mixture of sensations. But, oddly enough, I wasn't afraid—not in the least. Though I knew I was travelling fast, the drop seemed to take a tremendous time. Of course it lasted only a few seconds, but it seemed like an hour.

"I cannot explain it, but all the time I was dropping I reckoned I had a chance;

I Never Expected to Get Killed.

I could see myself right over those telephone wires, and they were swiftly coming up to meet me. I felt certain I had a chance, and I was hopeful even when I saw men down below getting ready to gather up what was left of me.

"Then there came the bump. I hit the wires—I think with my head and shoulders—and some of them snapped under my weight. My head went right through them, but my legs caught, tangled, and in a twinkling I got a hold with my hands.

"Even then, however, I wasn't out of the woods. I was frightened of causing a short circuit or something of the kind—I don't know much about electricity and I moved very carefully. The fellows down below, wildly excited, yelled to me to stop where I was, but the wires weren't comfortable enough, and I thought I might fall into the road. So I scrambled along to the post and slid down to the footpath.

"You should have seen the fuss they made of me! One of the boys told me that 'the devil always took care of his own.' Maybe he was right, but I wasn't worrying about that just then. I felt all right, but just a bit shaky.

"There was a huge crowd round me in no time, for hundreds of people, it seems, had seen me fall, and they came running from all directions. They were amazed to see me alive and able to walk.

"I wasn't a bit sore, and after a few minutes I went back to the building. I climbed up to the scaffold again and was going to start my job once more when they made me come in; they said

I'd Done Enough for One Day.

Shortly after that I came over very dizzy. My limbs felt sore and I had a sensation of sickness, so a policeman went with me to the hospital.

"They found some cuts and bruises, but nothing calling for treatment, and they told me to go home and rest.

"Curiously enough, my accident was practically foretold. On the Sunday night I was playing about with a pack of cards at home, and a friend of mine killed time by telling my fortune. Being dark, I was represented by the jack of spades and almost every time the cards were shuffled the jack showed up with the ace of spades upside down on one side and the nine of spades on the other. That, said my friend, was a sure sign of sickness or death—and the prophecy came very near proving true. I suppose a pack of cards can't deal with such things as telephone wires!' I thought of the prophecy just before I fell."

People with a superstitious turn of mind will be interested to know that Wright was born with a caul over his face, and so, according to an ancient belief very popular among sailors, is immune from death by accident. He has twice been nearly drowned, but the fall here described is likely to remain his closest shave.

Wealthiest Titled Woman in World Aids in Relief Work.

The Duchess of Devonshire, wife of the largest landowner in England, Sir Victor Christian William Cavendish, is devoting all her time to relief work for the English soldiers who were wounded at the battlefields. The Duchess was formerly Lady Evelyn Fitzmaurice, eldest daughter of the 5th Marquess of Lansdowne, and has two sons and five daughters. Her husband succeeded to the title in 1908 upon the death of his uncle. Some of the Duke's finest estates and homes have been thrown open to the care of the wounded.

"Rita," the famous novelist, has just had a great compliment paid her, for a complete set of her works has been ordered by Queen Mary. "Rita," whose real name is Mrs. Desmond Humphries, never dictates. She writes everything in her own hand, and it is afterwards typewritten. She writes for five hours a day—three in the morning and two in the evening—and can produce a book of 80,000 or 100,000 words in two months if she is put to it. In the afternoon she never writes. That is a time when her brain refuses to act, so she goes out into the fresh air to interest herself in something that will take her mind from her work.

Victor Emmanuel, King of Italy, is a keen fisherman and spends hour after hour with his rod, though the best of luck does not always attend his piscatorial expeditions. Once, after several hours' angling had brought him only three poor fish and he was returning to the castle, he was met by a peasant with a magnificent catch of trout. "You seem to be no great fisherman, to judge by your catch," commented the peasant. "I should say you were about as lucky as the King." "Why?" inquired his Majesty. "Oh," replied the peasant, "he thinks a great deal of himself as a sportsman, but he is a poor body, much more fit to be a king than a fisherman."

Bible in 600 Tongues.

The Bible is now printed in 600 languages and dialects, and every year from eight to ten new languages or dialects are added to the list. It is not known how many dialects are spoken on earth, but it is estimated that seven out of every ten of the human population had provided for them the Gospel story in their own tongues.

ERIN'S VALIANT POLICEMEN.

Ireland In Proud of the Royal Constabulary.

In an article which appeared in London Answers, September 20th, 1913, it was foretold that in the event of war, the men of the Royal Irish Constabulary could provide a contingent for active service. This statement has been more than realized.

A short time ago the inspector-general, Colonel Sir Neville Chamberlain, issued a circular asking for two hundred volunteers for the Irish Guards. In a few days two thousand applications were received. As only young unmarried constables were eligible, this meant that practically every suitable man volunteered.

Without doubt the Royal Irish Constabulary is composed of the very pick of the youth of Ireland. It is a military force, first formed in 1836 under the name of the Irish Constabulary. In 1867 Queen Victoria conferred upon it the coveted prefix "Royal," to show her appreciation of the effective manner in which the Fenian rising was quelled.

Before being appointed to stations recruits are given six months' rigorous military training. They are armed with rifles and sword bayonets, and every constable must secure a certificate of proficiency in musketry.

In country districts the sergeant keeps his men up to scratch by daily drill in the barrack-yard. There must be no laxity, for the monthly or quarterly "full-dress parade" inspections of the district and county inspectors are always searching in character. Occasional Morris-tube practice keeps their aim true.

The officers, as well as the rank and file of the force, have also a wonderful spirit of sterling patriotism. Numbers of them have been granted commissions as captains in Irish regiments.

Then, again, ex-sergeants and ex-head-constables, who were enjoying their well-earned pensions, enlisted in Kitchener's army as instructors.

Ireland is proud of her soldiers' sons, but it will grow proud of her martial policemen.

ETIQUETTE OF THE DROSHKY.

The Gentleman Must Hold the Lady in the Carriage.

The Siberian method of riding in a droshky requires an etiquette all its own, which, although sometimes surprising to the English traveller who encounters it for the first time, is based upon practical considerations. The danger of being thrown out has determined the prevailing usage, says Mrs. John Clarence Lee in "Across Siberia Alone."

If a gentleman escorts a lady, it is his task to hold her in the carriage—not an easy occupation. He accomplishes it by putting his arm round her waist. A man who fails to do so is considered as lacking in courtesy. When you have become acquainted with the custom, it seems entirely sensible and comfortable, but it seems strange at first to find yourself settling back into a stranger's arms.

An American, who had lived in Russia and whom we met in China, told us that he was driving with a woman physician, a Russian, middle-aged, and of the stunt Russian type. He knew nothing about his duty toward her, and they thrashed round that three by-five droshky until the woman turned angrily toward him.

"Have you been brought up in the backwoods that you don't know enough to hold me in this droshky?" she said.

He immediately put his arm round her waist as far as it would go, and held on hard.

Care of the Chicks.

Young chicks should not be allowed to roost too early. Let them seek the roost of their own free will. Care should be taken, however, that they do not crowd in the pens, or brood coops. They will sometimes persist in piling up and the under ones suffer accordingly. The extra warmth producing perspiration is weakening and stunts them beyond point of recovery. They are also liable to catch cold with a sudden change of the temperature.

Study Climatic Conditions.

One of the commonest mistakes which orchardists make is to try to follow the same system of pruning in all parts of the country. Climatic and other conditions make a big difference in the growing and bearing habits of trees, and in order to secure the best results it is necessary to adapt pruning methods to suit local conditions.

The Darkest Hour;

Or, The Hope That Still Lived.

"There is a better reason than that for my not touching him," he retorted with a short, jarring laugh, "and that is that he is a sneak and a scoundrel. After all, a gentleman is only supposed to quarrel with his equals; he lowers himself when he takes umbrage at anything that a cad says or does. In such a case, kicking is the only possible punishment."

Christine winced and shrank a little; but she held her head all the while and kept her lips very tightly closed lest her indignation should prompt her to say something that was better left unsaid. Besides, she was conscious that her mother had just entered the room. Very softly Lady Dare had come in, and after noiselessly closing the door behind her she had sunk into the nearest chair, and was now lying back in it with closed eyes. Not for anything in the world would Christine have roused her and troubled her then by any interchange of hard words with the lover to whom, for cold duty's sake, she had pledged herself for the second time.

That lover's anger had been aroused, however, and he seemed to see no necessity for restraining himself.

"Will you show me that letter?" He spoke to her in a voice that commanded, to her, the petted darling of her home, to whom no such tone of command had ever before been addressed, save only once by her father. Flushing, she drew back from him and shook her head.

"No; I cannot show it to you. It is not because I am afraid to do so, but because the writer did not intend it to be seen by any one else than myself. I will show it to my mother, if that will satisfy you, but not to you."

Southport so far forgot himself as to mutter an oath below his breath.

"How many other letters has he written to you?" he next demanded to know. "Three or four a day, I suppose?"

"No," Christine denied gently, "only this one. And he knows that he will not write another, because now I am pledged to you—unless—unless——"

She broke off, clasping her hands tightly together. He interpreted that movement aright. He knew that what she had meant to say was: "Unless something should happen to release me from my engagement to you and to make me his again."

He drew back a step or two and stood looking at her. He said to himself that if she had been an ordinary sort of girl he would not have borne any longer with her coldness, but would have gone away and let her marry whomsoever she would—a chimney sweep if she so chose. But she was not an ordinary-looking girl. He admired her more than ever as his insignificant little eyes feasted on her now. She was certainly a pearl among women, a rose queen of the rosebud garden, even in her plain black frock, whose blackness was relieved only by a cluster of fragrant white hyacinth bells which her mother had pinned in among the soft black folds and transparent chiffon swathings which made her bodice a mystery of simple yet charming elegance. Nature had never intended her to wear black in her youth, he told himself, as he studied admiringly the manner in which her fair head, supported on the round and full white throat, rose from out the sombreness of those draperies. The effect, he thought, was much the same as if a rose were framed in crape. She should have known nothing of the "wearing" of black for another twenty years or more. It was true that her face had not yet regained its roundness of outline, nor her cheeks their vanished roses; but her mere youthfulness and sweetness still made her radiant to behold. And Lord Southport decided once more and irrevocably in his secret soul that, even though she might not love him, nor be tender and sweet to him, he yet could not live without her. She was worth keeping to and finally winning at all hazards.

"A precious melancholy house this is to come to," he complained presently, breaking the short interval of silence. "There's your father as gloomy as he can be, and your mother full of misery, and the very butler with a face as long as a fiddle, and now you, who ought to be the life of the place, looking like a sorrowful angel. And, of course, I know that, whatever excuse you may give for your paleness and sadness, you're fretting after that hypocrite Hardy. It's too bad, Christine, upon my word it is. I come here to see you in the hope of getting some brightness to compensate me for the misery of living with my father just now. But if you're not ever going to smile upon me, I might as well stay at home."

"Is your father ill, then?" the girl asked quickly, and with real anxiety and sympathy in her voice.

The affianced lover whom she did not love answered doubtfully and perplexedly.

"Well, he's not ill exactly; and yet he's worse than ill. He's suffering from melancholia, or nerves, or something of the sort; he can't sleep—he hasn't slept for weeks, except with the help of narcotics—and he walks about muttering to himself things that nobody can understand. The doctors say he must have had a shock of some sort. But none of us know anything about a shock except that one of the footmen says that one night a few weeks ago a stranger, a young man that nobody had seen before, got into the smoking-room window somehow without being let in, and confronted him when he entered with some words that appeared to stagger him. This is all we know. But the mysterious young man may only have been presenting a bill, or something of that sort. Anyhow, it makes one wretched to live in the same house with a person in that condition. So when I come here to see you I expect to be comforted. You've disappointed me this morning, so far, but there's still time to make up for it. Let us go for a ride. You look as if you wanted some fresh air."

But again Christine drew back.

"No. Not this morning. I have not spirits enough to ride this morning," she pleaded.

She saw the flush of anger rise in his face again.

He seized her hands and thereby drew her closer to him.

"You seem to forget that you've promised to marry me, and that therefore I've a right to better treatment from you," he said, half bitterly, half fiercely. "You seem to forget that the time will come, and precious soon, too, when you'll have to make a show of loving me, whether you do or not. I've got a right to take you in my arms and kiss you, whether you like it or not. So you may as well do it soon as late. It'll be all the same in the end."

His arms had locked her in a tight, close hold; he believed that he and she were alone. He had not heard that soft opening of the door some minutes before, when Lady Dare had crept in and had fallen as if exhausted into the chair that was nearest her at the other end of the room. He bent his face down to kiss the girl, who was soon to be made his by the law and by the Church. What man had the right to kiss her if he had not?

Yet she fought against the caress, turning her face aside, and trying to draw herself away from him. And his face, whose only attraction lay in the fact that it was a young face, became alight with a deeper and hotter resentment.

"You may have your own way now in this matter, but you won't have it after I've married you," he said to her in a voice which he tried in vain to make calm. "I'll make you love me then. You can be as sure of that as that we're standing here together now. I'll make you love me right enough when once I have got you fast and sure, beyond all risk of losing you again."

Christine shivered. And then, from the other end of the room, Lady Dare spoke, rising as she did so and coming forward.

"Men always say that," she remarked, half playfully, half bitterly. "But it isn't every one of them that, after marriage, finds himself able to carry his words into practice."

"Do you mean me to understand that you uphold Christine in her foolish wilfulness?" Lord Southport inquired of her hotly.

"I do not say that I do," Lady Dare quickly responded, evidently shrinking from his anger. This shrinking on her part, who had nothing to fear, sent a stab through the daughter's heart. Young though the girl was, she could remember her mother as one of the bravest and strongest-nerved of women; and now this grave and terrible secret that she bore within her had made her no more than the shadow of her former self—a veritable wreck who, after living for many months in a state of continual alarm and dread, had reached a nervous state in which everything startled her and set her trembling; yes, even every little thing which happened casually during the day—the sudden bark of a dog, the sudden cry of a child, or the unexpected appearance before her of one of her servants, one of her friends or acquaintances, or even one of the few remaining members of the family. The recent report of her son Ronald's death in poverty and misery in London had so shocked her and broken her down that she had spent a fortnight in bed, and the doctors had doubted if she would ever have strength to rise from that bed again.

"Do not speak angrily to my mother. She is ill, and it is not her fault that I seem unkind to you," Christine appealed now to her mortified affianced lover. The appeal evidently annoyed him further, for, turning away from them both, he caught up his hat and went forward to one of the French windows, unfastened one of the glass doors, and quitted the room by way of the verandah.

Outside, rain was beginning to fall, not cold, sleety winter rain, but the softer rain of early spring, which refreshes rather than chills. Within the luxurious room, where a wood fire burned picturesquely in a brass basket, the atmosphere was warm and sweet; sweet with the fragrance of mauve and white and pink hyacinths in pots, and with the yet richer scent of masses of freesia in Dresden bowls, and of hothouse roses in vases of Venetian glass. Left alone, the mother and the daughter looked at each other without speaking. The blackness of their gowns jarred with the warm and varicolored beauty of the things about them—the tapestry-hung room and the countless treasures of art filled it, from the old French furniture to the Louis XV. snuffbox, which was at once the smallest and the most costly of the many ornaments with which the small octagonal tables were crowded. Here, surely, the living figures for whom all this elegance had been designed should have been clad in the softer, brighter hues that go with youth and loveliness. Decidedly, the room was not one to be sad in. Christine Dare felt this as now she waited for her mother to speak.

"Don't you think you are a little unkind to him, Christine?" her mother asked her tremulously. "You see, you are going to marry him; he is to be your husband, and that gives him the right to say and do things which you do not like. He has the right. You should not forget that."

Christine's head drooped upon her breast.

"Do you think it is right, mother, for a woman to let a man kiss her when she does not love him, and when, what is worse, she loves another man?"

Lady Dare hesitated.

"She should try to love the man who is to be her husband," she said presently in a faint voice.

"But if she cannot, mother—if she cannot—what then?"

"She must try hard," the mother insisted, but still faintly. "You must not make yourself believe that you cannot love Lord Southport, Christine. If you think you can't love him you never will. If you give way to thinking you can't love him, you never will love him. But it oughtn't to be so hard for you. You were fond of Billy once."

Christine looked round quickly.

"I liked him very well as a brother, but not as a lover—never as a lover, never as the man whom I would choose to be my husband, my hero, my prince." She stretched forth her arms and, moving forward, clasped them about her mother's neck. "Oh, mother, can't you spare me? Can't you spare me? I find the sacrifice harder, a thousand times harder, than I ever thought it could be. I feel that I shall give way under the strain of it—that if the worst comes to the worst and the hour comes for this unblessed marriage, I shall run away, do anything, go anywhere, to avoid its sinfulness. Mother, are you sure after all that the thing we fear is grave enough and black enough to justify this sacrifice? If the story all came out, would the result be so very bitter, so very terrible?"

"Terrible!" echoed Lady Dare, aghast. "Christine, you must be mad to ask such a question! Cannot you see yourself what the consequences would be to your father, to myself, and to you? I tell you truly that I should be a dead woman within a month of the revelation of the facts, if they should come to be revealed. And the blow, coming after the other calamities—the calamities of Ronald's death and of our having been brought to the brink of ruin—would surely drive your father into a madhouse. And do you not see in what position you yourself would stand before the world? Why, even Southport, who is passionately in love with you, might yet not marry you if he knew the truth—the disgraceful truth."

Christine was walking restlessly to and fro over the soft rich Persian rugs that covered the parquet floor. At her mother's last words she stopped suddenly to ask:

"How much does he know?"

"Nothing, beyond the bare fact that there is a secret," Lady Dare replied. "He is too well bred to seek to know any more of a woman's secret than she thinks it safe to tell him."

"For that very same reason he would keep the story safe if it were told him," the girl enjoined, catching at a faint chance. "Might we not tell him enough to make him to refuse to marry me—knowing as we do that he will not betray us?"

"No—no," a fever of dread had seized her mother, and was showing itself in hectic spots on her faded cheeks and in a new and desperate light in her blue eyes—blue eyes which once had been frank as her daughter's and roguish, but which were now furtive and strange. "Why will you think of these things? Why do you constantly try for a means of escape? Is your love for Brian Hardy stronger than your love for me, your mother? I tell you that there is no escape possible, no way possible except by your carrying out your promise to the letter, and marrying Southport. That is Mrs. Crookenden's condition for keeping silence, and it must be fulfilled. I would help it if I could, but I cannot. I thought my early fault was dead and buried for ever, but it has arisen, and we have to suffer."

"Mrs. Crookenden!" Christine had started with surprise at the mention of that name. "What has she to do with it? What difference can it make to her whether I marry Lord Southport or Brian Hardy."

Lady Dare shook her head helplessly.

"I don't know," she answered, glancing apprehensively about the room as she did so. "I have wondered about that myself. But of one thing I am certain, and that is that we cannot afford to disregard her threats. She is a terrible woman, Christine; I have found that out in the course of my dealings with her. She is a woman whom nobody can afford to defy. In some way that I cannot account for she has got us all into her power. I repeat, we are lost unless you keep your word to me, Christine."

Christine said no word after this; but her young face seemed to become whiter, and to take on a look so nearly like despair that Lady Dare shivered to behold it.

"But never mind this now," the mother added hurriedly. "Let us talk of something lighter—the things that will have to be bought for you within the next three weeks. The trousseau need not, of course, be an elaborate one, as the marriage is going to be very private, and the family is in deep mourning, but the outfit must be complete, and however small it is, there will be difficulty enough in getting it ready in time. You will require at least half a dozen black or black and white dinner gowns, and there should be twice as many afternoon reception frocks, besides tailor-made frocks. I don't think any ball gowns will be necessary, because you will not be going out much in that way while your mourning lasts. But there will be a great deal to think of and arrange, and we ought to begin at once."

Christine sighed, and the whiteness of her face seemed to the eyes of her mother to take on a suggestion of fear. This talk of a trousseau, of wedding garments, brought luridly near to her feet the edge of the precipice towards which she was being driven.

"Need we think of these things at all?" she murmured tremblingly. "Will not the clothes I have already do well enough? Surely they ought to be made to do. If we are so near to worldly ruin as you say, surely we ought not in this case to spend money on things that are not absolutely necessary."

Lady Dare shook her head.

"Suitably elegant clothes are certainly absolutely necessary for the future Lady Southport and Countess of Yorford," she said with decision. And Christine, looking at her, realized all at once that it would be a kindness to her to let her occupy herself with this subject of frocks and cloaks and hats and shoes as closely and as fully as possible. It gave her something to distract her mind from the peril in which she was living day by day and hour by hour. Already the good effect of the new interest was visible in the brightening of her face, and in the lifting up of her now bent head. And her voice had grown firmer as she added eagerly:

"And even if we are on the verge of ruin, it does not matter as far as the trousseau is concerned. We must be properly dressed, however poor we may be, and you will have a position to keep up. And we need not pay ready-money, you know; our credit is still as good as ever. You see, we have had for many years the reputation of being wealthy. That was a true enough reputation, too, until just lately. It is only during this past year that things have gone against us. There seems to have been a curse laid suddenly upon us. I had ever felt sure that this secret of mine had been dead and buried too long to have a resurrection. I had ceased even to dream about it."

With the moment of her ceasing to speak, the door of the delightful morning-room was opened jerkily, and Sir Randolph came in. He was carrying a leather case, and his countenance was so changed by anger that his wife and daughter gazed at him with hearts beating slower with keen anxiety as he approached them. Lady Dare's anxiety, however, soon turned into a new and poignant fear as she recognized the leather case. He put the case on a table, rudely knocking over two or three valuable ornaments to make room for it. Then he lifted to his wife stern eyes of questioning and anticipative condemnation. He had opened the case, and now he took from it and showed to her a necklace of brilliants, row upon row of exquisitely set stones which, however, flashed out sullenly in the daylight that had been made somewhat gloomy by the low, grey clouds whence poured down the heavy rain that now lashed the windows.

Occurrences in the Land That Reigns Supreme in the Commercial World.

No fewer than 93 vessels, of a total of 310,155 tons, were launched on the river Tyne last year.

Every month a thousand tons of fire wood are sent to the British troops in France and Belgium.

An Australian contingent arrived in England on the 10th inst., and was enthusiastically welcomed.

The Dover Straits are only 21 miles wide at Calais, which has been connected with Dover by cable since 1851.

Gas was used to replace candles and lamps at a factory in Manchester in 1805, two years before the illuminant was introduced into London.

Sir Charles Hartley, the distinguished engineer, who played an important part in the development of the River Danube, has died in London.

The death last week at Coylton, Devon, of Sir George Turner is announced. Death was caused by leprosy, contracted during research work to discover a cure for the disease.

A huge woollen mill of five storeys, belonging to George Crosland & Sons at Crosland Moor, Huddersfield, was on the 20th ult. totally destroyed by fire.

News was received at his residence at Bournemouth on the 1st inst. of the death at Madeira of Mr. Frank Thomas Bullen, the well-known author of sea stories and writer on naval subjects.

An effort is being made to raise 100 miles of pennies for the Queen's Work for Women Fund. This is said to represent the sum of £22,000. The headquarters of the fund are 33 Portland Place, London.

There are about 9,500 British vessels of nearly 11,000 tons, engaged in the home and foreign trade. The Germans have destroyed less than 12,000 tons, or about one-tenth of 1 per cent. in the fist seven days of their blockade of British commerce.

Great Britain never had an army of more sober, self-sacrificing and devoted men than she has, and the spirit of patriotism which the men have exhibited has been emulated, if it has not been increased, by the example of the women they left behind them.—Sir Samuel Chisholm.

It is estimated that there are in Great Britain 70,000 barrels of herrings pickled in salt, the war preventing their export to Russia and Germany. Dr. J. H. Fullarton thinks these should now be obtained for the feeding of Britons and their families, and the nourishment of interned prisoners and "Tommies" in training. In these 770,000 barrels are 21,000,000 lbs. of flesh, or ½ lb. of salt herrings for each one of the population.

A woman in London who used to make $1,800 a year by teaching music has not been able to earn more than $15 since last July. This is a typical case, said Mathilde Verne the other day. She is president of the Women Musicians' Employment Fund, and she declares that the women teachers of music have been the hardest hit of all.

The Distinguishing Conduct Medal carries with it a gratuity of £20, paid on discharge, or an increase of pension of 6d. a day. The Victoria Cross carries, in the case of a private or non-commissioned officer, a special pension of £10 a year, which, by a comparatively recent regulation, may be increased to £50 if the holder is incapacitated from work at any time.

WALKERTON

A Walkerton stock buyer purchased a cow recently, shipped it to Toronto, sold it in the city for $92 and of course made some money in the transaction. This same bovine was reshipped to Walkerton and on being placed on auction at the market square on Saturday brought $93. Just why this cow advanced so rapidly in price or whether someone paid a fabulous price for her, those who are ready to vouch for the authenticity of the incident, are not prepared to state.—Telescope.

Mrs David Small, who has been ailing with smallpox for the past month, has recovered from the malady, and her home in the store block opposite the Royal Hotel was released from quarantine on Wednesday. Mrs Joe Heiterman, who lived across the hallway from the afflicted patient and who, it seems, had been visiting Mrs Small just prior to the outbreak of the disease, and whose home as a consequence was also placed under quarantine, was granted her liberty again this week. The case, which is the only one that has occurred in town this winter, was of a mild type, but how Mrs Small contracted it is a mystery. As the premises have been fumigated and every precaution taken it is not likely that any further outbreak of the disease will occur.

Mr Joseph Reichenbach, the pioneer butcher of Bruce county, died in Walkerton Tuesday evening last at the ripe old age of 82 years.

A meeting of the Pure Bred Live Stock Breeders from Bruce, Carrick and the neighboring townships was held in the Department of Agriculture on Saturday. A Breeders' Club was then organized with the following officers: President, Thomas Jasper, Carlsruhe; Vice president, W A Tolton, Walkerton; Secretary, N C McKay, Walkerton; Directors—Jas Thompson, Millimay; W T Hopper, Paisley; Geo B Armstrong, Formosa; J Miller, Belmore; Herb Pletsch, Carlsruhe; Ab Rowand, Henry Howsfeld, Jas Moore, Jas L Tolton and Jacob Dippel, Walkerton. The object is to promote the live stock industry, and they propose holding an annual sale. The first will be held early in the spring of 1906.

Mr Samuel Christie, one of the oldest settlers of Brant township, died on Saturday evening last, after a week's illness, aged 85 years, 5 months and 6 days. The deceased, who was born in the county of Langford, Ireland, came to Brant township about 65 years ago, when the place was mostly forest, and settled on lot 8, con 8, where he has practically resided ever since. He was a splendid farmer, and at the time of his death owned 200 acres of land besides much personal property. He was a Conservative in politics and an Anglican in religion, and was one of the best known and most highly esteemed men in the township. His wife dying about six years ago, he leaves four sons and three daughters as follows: William of Sask; Richard, of Bruce; Thos and Leonard, at home; Mrs Henry Young, Mrs Herb Napper and Mrs Alex Robertson, of Brant. The funeral, which took place on Tuesday to the Walkerton cemetery, was largely attended.—Herald and Times.

THE PASSING OF CAPT. McKINNON

Capt. Hugh McKinnon is dead. This is the sad news that fell upon the ears of our citizens as they wended their way to business last Thursday morning. The late Captain had been ailing since last December, and it was only last week that it was deemed advisable to move him to Kincardine Hospital to undergo an operation for gallstones. The operation, which was performed on Wednesday, revealed other troubles, and he passed away on Thursday evening.

Deceased was born in the Island of Tiree, Scotland, 69 years ago, and when six years of age, along with his parents, set sail for Canada. They came straight to Bruce County and settled on the farm from which the funeral was held, being lot 11, con. 10, Kincardine Tp.

Capt. McKinnon was one of the last of the late sailors. Only for one season he sailed a steam vessel; he loved the wooden ship with the iron men and had no use, as he once declared, for the iron ships with the wooden men. Steam did away with the sailorman of the old type, who survives only as a yachtsman. He grieved over the passing of the sailing vessel, but he stood by her to the last. He used to make up his mind at the end of the season not to venture out again, but as spring approached his craving for the sea would return. He was singularly successful and had but few mishaps during his long career on the sea. His greatest exploit was in bringing his ship, the Sophie, and crew safely out of the storm on Nov. 9th, 1903. It was a trying experience for an old man and told on him severely for a while, perhaps permanently. He could always command control of a sailing vessel, for besides being a cautious navigator he was a prudent business man, ever zealous of his employer's interests. He saw his contemporaries retire one by one from the sea, but he continued, and practically died in harness. Genuine regret will be felt on every port on Lake Huron and Georgian Bay where he was a well known figure. Personally he was a very companionable man, fond of the associates of his youth and of the sea. He was tender-hearted to a degree and bore the goodwill of all who knew him. He married Miss Annie McKinnon, daughter of the late Neil McKinnon, of Bruce Tp., who, along with a family of six girls and five boys survive. They are Mrs. Thos. Wood, of Langham, Sask.; Mrs. Rhodes, of Lethbridge; Mrs. Creighton, of Prince Albert; Mrs. P. DeMoss, of Detroit; Ethel, of Hamilton No[illegible] School; Miss Catherine, at home; Daniel, in Alaska, Archie, of Edmonton; Neil, John and Clark, at home.—Review.

Walked from Toronto to Glamis

A travel-stained, mud-bespattered man appeared on the streets of Walkerton one night last week and on being questioned by pedestrians, claimed to have walked from Toronto and was on his way to Glamis, where, he stated, he had secured employment with a farmer. He enquired as to whether there were any more trains that night and having only 35c in his pocket, not enough for a night's lodging, he struck over the hills on the last lap of his long and tedious journey. This incident, of a man walking 130 miles for work, will give some idea of the sentence of the unemployed problem in Toronto and other cities.—Telescope.

—The Rifle Association held a meeting on Friday evening, when arrangements were made to have practice on the ranges two days each week during the summer, commencing after May 1st. Matches will be held on May 24th and July 5th. Messrs. Emerson Pearce and J. Godwin are team captains.

—I take this opportunity of thanking my many customers for their liberal patronage during the time I was in business in Paisley, and would beg to solicit a continuance of their trade to my successor, Mr. A. T. Bonathan, who I can recommend as an upright, energetic business man. W. S. MITCHELL.

—Mr. John Cruickshank, a Paisley boy who has been away from town over thirty years, was here for a few days last week. Jack has knocked about the continent a great deal, and spent many years in the Southern States, and came here almost direct from Mexico, where he put in the winter. He is a son of the original bus line owner in Paisley, and well known among the old boys.

—Mr. Addie Pfaff was taken to Toronto General Hospital on Friday suffering from a tumor on the brain, and on Monday underwent an operation. A portion of the skull was removed to relieve pressure upon the brain, and the patient at the latest report is improving. Mr. H. Pfaff accompanied his son, and on Monday Mrs Pfaff also went down, in company with Rev. Mr. McEwen.

—Mrs. Thos. Mole, treasurer of the Women's Patriotic League of Paisley, has received an acknowledgment from the Canadian Red Cross Society for remittance of $117—$100 of which is the proceeds of the carnival held in Paisley rink, and $17 proceeds of patriotic sale by Ballachey, Laidlaw & Co. This is to be used in paying for two beds in the Duchess of Connaught's Canadian Red Cross Hospital at Cliveden at $50 each, these beds to be called "Paisley, Ontario, Canada Beds," and the balance of the subscription will go to the general fund of the Society.

—The art exhibition last week was viewed by a great many, and not a few made repeated visits to the hall where the pictures were shown. Residents of small towns are not very often privileged to behold such a splendid collection of reproductions as were comprised in the exhibit. The school children furnished some afternoon entertainment to add to the attraction. The ball was also open on Friday evening, when the brass band played outside at intervals and a nice programme of recitations, vocal and instrumental music was rendered inside by local talent.

EUROPE'S GREAT DIPLOMAT

SIR EDWARD GREY, BRITAIN'S FOREIGN SECRETARY.

He Broke the Spell of German Leadership, and Cemented the Triple Entente.

Among the diplomatists of Europe, Sir Edward Grey is easily the outstanding figure. He does not tower above them as Bismarck towered above his contemporaries or Metternich above the men of an earlier day. But if an European congress were to meet to-morrow to wind up the war I imagine that Sir Edward would be unanimously chosen to preside over it. The prestige and confidence he commands place him in a class by himself, writes Sydney Brooks.

For one thing, of all the foreign secretaries now in the service of the great powers Sir Edward is the oldest, not in years, but what counts for far more, in tenure of office. For now all but a decade, without a single interruption, he has guided the foreign policies of Great Britain. That in itself is a considerable asset. Every other power has changed its Foreign Minister in that period at least once and several of them twice and three times. There has been something impressive about his fixity.

Then, too, his position differed radically from theirs in character. What is the Foreign Minister in Berlin, or Petrograd, or Vienna, or even in Rome? Little more than the mouthpiece and clerk of his sovereign. What is he in Paris? The fools of political parties that are forever forming new combinations. Not a man among them has felt really secure. They were in power to-day; for all they knew they might be gone to-morrow. But no one in or out of Great Britain has ever suspected Sir Edward Grey of holding office by the favor of any single individual or as acting as another man's deputy and shadow or of being likely to be ousted by a political intrigue, an electoral turnover or some purely personal whim.

Moreover, the ten years during which Sir Edward Grey has been charged with the conduct of British foreign policy have been years of almost constant crisis and commotion. They have pretty thoroughly tested him, and by the universal judgment of friend and foe he has stood the test well. He entered Downing Street just when the Franco-German feud over Morocco was in its opening stages. He at once took a definite line and backed France for all he was worth. It was a course of action that on at least three separate occasions, long before the crisis that came to a head last August, involved the risk of war with Germany. Sir Edward did not shrink from it. He held that Great Britain was bound to support the third Republic with all the diplomatic, and, if necessary, all the material power at her disposal, and after many anxious moments the issue abundantly justified his prescience and pluck. From his long duel with the Wilhelmstrasse between 1905 and 1911 over the Morocco question he emerged decidedly the victor.

Handling Balkan Crisis.

That in itself gave him an enviable position and reputation throughout Europe. He had broken the spell of success which German diplomacy had inherited from the Bismarckian days. But besides this Sir Edward is the first British Minister who has thought and conceived an accommodation with Russia and so ended the inveterate antagonism that used to separate the two powers. The triple entente, that expanded into the triple alliance between Great Britain, France and Russia was very largely his work and the value of the agreement he effected with Russia in 1907 was abundantly proved when Persia lapsed into anarchy, and when but for the understanding between London and Petrograd and the demarcation of Russian and British "spheres of influence" in the realm of the Shah, all the old enmities would have revived and a collision could with difficulty have been averted.

But what raised Sir Edward to an easy first among European diplomatists was his handling of the Balkan crisis in 1912 and 1913. He took the lead in keeping Europe together. All the suggestions he put forward were wise, timely, and fruitful, and the acceptance they met with among the powers was a tribute both to his initiative and personality and to the peculiarly disinterested position that Great Britain occupied in the affairs of South-Eastern Europe.

And then last August came the supreme crisis of all to add once more to the greatness of his reputation. Sir Edward, as the record shows, struggled with the powers of darkness to the last minute of the eleventh hour, cool and persuasive, trying one door after another, offering even to wash his hands of the consequences if France and Russia refused any reasonable accommodation that Germany might suggest. No one could have worked harder or more pertinently to preserve peace. But many Englishmen feel that when it came to the point of deciding between peace and war Sir Edward was caught between two minds, began dealing in half measures and was only saved by Germany's unutterable folly in invading Belgium and her debasing proposal that Great Britain should bargain away the French overseas empire. There was a day or two of fearful suspense and hesitation. Finally the blunders of his adversary, Sir Edward Grey came down on the right side and in the eyes of the world lost little and gained much for his country and himself by his delay in committing Great Britain to draw the sword.

Will Dictate Terms.

One may see at this moment that the greatest of all the obstacles in Germany's path is British sea power. Two months hence the now British army will be beating her down on land, and when peace comes the prediction may easily be verified that Great Britain would emerge from the conflict more powerful and in a better position to go on fighting indefinitely than any of the belligerents on either side.

This means, of course, that the major share in settling the terms of peace will fall upon Great Britain; in other words, upon Sir Edward Grey. A year or so hence may find the eyes of the whole world fixed upon him.

He is one of the least theatrical of men. If ever an orator might have been forgiven for making a great speech it was Sir Edward Grey when he rose in the House of Commons last August to unfold the diplomatic controversy that had led up to the war and to announce the policy of Great Britain. It was eminently characteristic of him that he made no attempt whatever to be eloquent. He delivered a plain, unemotional statement of the facts, reviewed the negotiations, explained and defended without heat or rhetoric the line he had pursued and enunciated in a few grave sentences the further developments that might be expected. It was a typical performance, weighty to the point of lucid orderliness, unadorned by any play of the imagination, but strong and telling in its straightforwardness, the sureness of its grip, its sincerity and quiet assurance.

An ardent fisherman, a lover and student of nature and flowers and birds and a devoted Wordsworthian, he brings into the arena of party turmoil, the philosophic poise and detachment, the silence and self-continence, born of or at any rate fostered, by his favorite pursuits. A strong man and a sane man, with a larger fund of humanity and a greater warmth of temperament than he allows the public to suspect, absolutely without personal ambition and with very few illusions, pregnant and impressive in all his utterances, firm but adventurous in action, there is something in him that recalls the self-possession and sober dignities of a bygone age.

Hydraulic Cartridges.

It is often hard and sometimes dangerous to use ordinary explosives for mining and excavating in confined spaces—a fact that has led to the development of the hydraulic mining cartridge, described in Chambers's Journal as a safe and effective substitute. The cartridge consists of a steel cylinder, containing numerous small pistons that move at right angles to the longitudinal axis of the main cylinder, and that expand when water is injected into them with a hand pump. After drilling a deep enough hole, the workmen insert the main cylinder, and then set to work at the hand pump. The tiny pistons expand until their free extremities bear against the mass of rock with constantly increasing force, and the rock is gradually fractured under the tremendous pressure. The operation, it is said, is not only cheaper than the ordinary blast, but disintegrates a large area of rock.

Do Your Best.

We talk much of the courage of those who do not shrink and bend when for an hour or two they face the approach of death in shipwreck or other unexpected calamity. Do we think of the courage of the miner who goes cheerily to daily work from which he knows too well that he may never return? Do we realize that every aging man or woman is watching the daily approach of death, month after month, and yet keeps a smiling face, and sows crops for next season, and plants trees and prepares dwellings for the coming generation? For though the young know that they may die at any moment, the old understand that they cannot live much longer, and that it must be their last days which are flying past them with such incredible rapidity. Thus, even without any sensational occurrence, to each life comes the hardest opportunity.

Germany's Food Markets Under the Supervision of the Government.

Though reports are numerous that the foodstuffs of Germany are dwindling to such an extent that the nation is on the verge of starvation, the scenes of activity which are witnessed in the market places of the Kaiser's domain seem to belie the rumors which persist in being spread broadcast. Since the outbreak of the war the German Government, appreciating the fact that food plays a greater part in war than bullets, has taken charge of its public markets, and the sale of food and foodstuffs is now directly controlled by the Government. The photo shows a scene of activity in the world's largest hop market at Nuremberg, Germany.

TOWED BY A SWORDFISH.

Exciting Adventure of Two Fishermen in the Mexican Gulf.

A thrilling fishing experience is described by Mr. Charles Frederick Holder in the Outer's Book. Running through heavy seas in a launch, Mr. Holder approached the two fishermen who had hooked the swordfish. They were in a skiff that could not have weighed over two hundred pounds, and in almost pitchy darkness were going out to sea, towed stern first by the fish, which gave no sign of weakening. They had been playing him for two hours. He tells what followed:

Pinchot bent back, straining at the rod; his face was drenched with spume. The fish, two hundred yards away, towed them by a thread of twenty-one strands that would break the moment that Pinchot permitted a strain of more than forty-one pounds to fall on it. Now on the crest of a wave, now deep down in a ghastly abyss, they rushed on behind that vigorous steed.

My craft was too fast, and I continually surged ahead. I sat with my right hand on the clutch of the engine. When I came dangerously near I threw off the clutch or backed; when they got beyond me I came on again. As the sea grew heavier and the sky darker, I slowed down, and had to sheer off to avoid them; when I did so, the big seas would catch me side on and nearly roll the launch over. Time and again that happened, but we always came to time and got round near the skiff. Going stern first, I feared the skiff might founder, and I wished to be on the spot to pick the fishermen up at once, for from what I knew of Pinchot he would not let go of the rod.

It was a weird and wonderful sight to see that light boat toss, leap and squirm in the phosphorescent sea that set up its blaze of lambent lights all about, and the darker it grew the more brilliant the exhibition became. At last the stars filled the sky, and I could see the two in the skiff plainly. How many times I shut off that long-suffering engine and backed away into outer darkness I do not know; but it was six or seven miles out in the channel in an ever-rising sea that I heard the cry, "I've got him!"

Pinchot had drawn the boat up over the swordfish, and now held him while Joe reached for him with the gaff. I came up astern, and shut off my engine, as I shouted my congratulations, when a big sea struck me, and I went bowling into them.

As the launch smashed into them, Joe lost his hold of the gaff; but Pinchot reached over and grabbed the tail of the ten-foot, almost three-hundred-pound swordfish, seized it and lay back, holding on until Mexican Joe could again get his gaff into action.

It was a brave act, and we let out a cheer. I backed off as they killed the fish, hauled him into the skiff and lashed him to the seats; then I went alongside and took them in, and with the skiff in tow, we hauled round until the North Star was astern, and headed dead away from it in the direction we knew San Clemente to be. The swordfish must have towed the anglers against the oars of Mexican Joe five or six miles.

LIFE IN SIBERIA.

Where the Natives Sleep—The Marriage Ceremony.

That happens only once in a lifetime. The native Koryak of Kamchatka, far up in the peninsula that is washed by the Bering Sea, can sleep comfortably in a room four feet high with six by eight feet of floor space, and have a fire smoking near all night, while the doors are tightly closed, and then does not object if three others share his apartment with him. To-morrow he will have chance enough to breathe more cold, fresh air than he cares for. His picture of the happy hereafter is a snug, cosy place, where every cell of his body can perpetually enjoy warmth, and where neither ears, fingers nor toes shall be frozen.

Once in his life, however, things get a little hotter than he can honestly enjoy; and that once he cannot escape if he is to be a man of importance in the community; for it is his marriage ceremony. As soon as the youth falls in love in dead earnest, he calls on the maiden's father to find out what dowry she can bring in case of eventual marriage. Since reindeer is the Koryak's medium of exchange, the dowry usually consists of reindeer. If the father consents to the engagement and the dowry pleases the young man, he interviews the girl and if she reciprocates his affection he enters her father's service. Chopping wood, tending the herds, cultivating the garden, and all other kinds of farm work fall to his share. The period of service lasts from two to three years.

The marriage ceremony begins about six in the evening. There is a building in the village into which the villagers crowd at twilight. A large hall runs through the centre of the building, on either side of which are from ten to fifteen little rooms, called pologs. Each polog is separated from the next by heavy reindeer curtains, and the entrance from each polog into the hall is closed by similar curtains. Nowhere in all that building except in the hall could a good-sized man stand upright.

After considerable eating and some drinking, a brass drum begins to beat. At the same time a solemn-faced Koryak passes from one polog to another, dropping willow sprouts and alder branches in each inclosure. Presently the beater of the drum begins to sing, to accompany his slow performance on the drum. Gradually he accelerates his beats and his song. Faster and faster he smites his drum; louder and louder he sings, until within thirty minutes he has worked himself into a state of frenzy—a consummation that is not without its effect upon the villagers. The stolid calm with which they entered, suggestive of an impending funeral, gives place to smiles, to tossings of the head, until by and by the whole crowd are as excited as their leader.

At this point, the front curtain of each polog goes up, and two or three women appear inside. In their hands are the willow sprouts and alder branches. In a moment the father of the bridegroom enters the building, leading the happy couple by the hand. The noise, the shouting and the whirling now become indescribable. At a signal from the groom's father, the bride dashes into the first polog to the right. The women that are within lift the curtain for her, and she passes quickly from one compartment to the next.

Not so with the groom. He dashes after her; but no sooner has he entered the first polog than the women begin to beat him with the willow sprouts and alder branches. He seizes the curtain to enter the next polog, but one or two women hold it down; and if he finally succeeds, there is a hot application of branches on that part of his anatomy that remains longest within the polog.

Meanwhile, the women in the next polog are ready to receive him with equal warmth. They ply the switches energetically, and do not hesitate to thrust out a foot also, in order that the "happy groom" may stumble, and afford a more enduring target for their blows.

There is no escape from this experience until the groom has entered and passed through every one of those twenty or thirty pologs. The front curtains are raised, so that the public has a clear chance to enjoy the spectacle.

Of course he never catches the bride. She has reached the last polog before he is halfway through. If she passes out of the last polog, he must work another year at her father's house, and pass through the same ordeal once more. But she usually awaits him in the last polog, and when they meet there the wedding ceremony is finished—they are man and wife.

The Farmer's Friend.

As Darwin long ago showed, the earthworm is the farmer's friend. Its burrows drain and aerate the soil, while the earth which has passed through its body is finely divided and is constantly being brought to the surface from lower levels. Their bodies are adapted to this burrowing habit. The pointed head-end is devoid of feelers and eyes, and the foot stumps are only represented by rows of bristles which can be felt if the finger be passed along the body from back to front. There are no jaws, but the muscular part of the digestive tube acts as a kind of pump for taking in food. This includes plants and animals. It has a small gizzard, which contains many stones, and these are used instead of teeth to grind the food.

Population of China.

The population of China has never been exactly ascertained. The latest census, taken in 1902, is said to yield a total of 410,000,000. Perhaps 300,000,000 would be a juster estimate; even that would absorb no less than one fifth of the human race. From the total it is easy to estimate that if the Chinese people were to march past a given point in single file the procession would never end; long before the last of the 300,000,000 had passed by a new generation would have sprung up to continue the endless line.

The Flags of a Ship.

On the staff in the bow—The jack of a nation to which vessel belongs. On the foremast—Flag of foreign nation to which vessel is going to. If going to own national port she carries flag of the nation she is leaving, if that nation happens to be foreign. On the mainmast—The house flag, always. On the aftermain (if she has one)—Flag bearing vessel's name. On the mizzen—Nothing. On the staff at the stern—The national ensign of the nation to which she belongs.

Unfortunately the average man seems to think the time to say no is the next time.

REPLENISH YOUR BLOOD IN THE SPRING

Just now you are feeling "out of sorts"—not your usual self. Quite exhausted at times and cannot devote real energy to your work. Sleep does not rest you and you wake up feeling "all tired out." Perhaps rheumatism is flying through your muscles and joints, or may be your skin is disfigured by freckles, boils or pimples. Headaches, twinges of neuralgia, fits of nervousness, irritability of temper and a disordered stomach often increase your discomfort in the spring.

The cause—winter has left its mark on you. These troubles are signs that your blood is poor and watery, that your nerves are exhausted. You must renew and enrich your blood at once and restore tone to your tired nerves, or there may be a complete breakdown. The most powerful remedy for these spring ailments in men, women and children is Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, because these Pills cleanse bad blood and strengthen weak nerves.

New, rich, red blood—your greatest need in spring—is plentifully created by Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and with this new, pure blood in your veins you quickly regain health and increase your strength. Then your skin becomes clear, your eyes bright, your nerves strong, and you feel better, eat better, sleep better, and are able to do your work.

Begin your spring tonic treatment to-day for the blood and nerves with Dr. Williams' Pink Pills—the Pills that strengthen.

These Pills are sold by most dealers, but do not be persuaded to take "something just the same." If you can't get the genuine Pills from your dealer they will be sent you by mail, post paid, at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 by writing The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

CURE BY "MEDICINE MAN."

Glutton Ceased Groaning When "Doctor" Found Cause.

In the Wide World Magazine P. H. Godsell writes of "The Land of the North Wind." He gives an account of life among the Crow Indians and tells how while the wife and children attend to the fish nets set in the lake and snare the rabbits in the surrounding woods the head of the family goes off in quest of larger game. Should he in the course of a few days return successful (having slain, perhaps, two or three moose) the whole family move camp to the spot where the meat lies, leaving only the wigwam poles to mark the place of their previous habitation.

Any other families that may be in the vicinity will be immediately called upon to share in the spoils, and all will gorge themselves to their utmost capacity until the larder is again empty, when it will be time for another hunt.

I remember upon one occasion arriving at a camp where the hunters had been successful.

The Crow had dined too well and was lying groaning on the floor of the wigwam, no doubt momentarily expecting to find himself on the darksome train to the happy hunting grounds. Accordingly, the services of the local conjurer or medicine man were called for, and he arrived very shortly with his drum, rattle and medicine bag. The conjurer spent at least an hour in shouting, gesturing and singing round the reclining Indian, shaking his rattle and beating the drum the while. Suddenly he shot his hand behind the Crow, and, crying that he had driven out that which was causing the sickness, he produced for the inspection of his patient a piece of ancient meat, which he had "palmed" in his hand, and which he explained had been seated in the man's stomach and had caused the irritation. He further informed the Crow that he was now quite well and could rise from the floor.

This faith cure was evidently successful, for the Crow ceased his groaning and stood up, and after having presented the medicine man with what was practically a new rifle as his fee, left the wigwam to explain to his friends the success of the treatment afforded by the "doctor."

MOTHER'S PRAISE BABY'S OWN TABLETS

Mrs. S. E. Laurie, Grafton, Ont., writes: "I have used Baby's Own Tablets ever since my baby was two weeks old and would not be without them as I consider them the best medicine in the world for little ones." What Mrs. Laurie says thousands of other mothers say. Simply because they have found the Tablets safe and sure and pleasant for the little ones to take. They are sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

No indulgence of passion destroys the spiritual nature so much as respectable selfishness.—George Macdonald.

"MEDICINE HAT."

How the Rising Young City Obtained Its Name.

Not many persons know what was the origin of the strange name borne by the Canadian city that Mr. Rudyard Kipling once called "The city born lucky."

The word "medicine" means more to an Indian than to us. We think of it as meaning something nasty that is good for us, but the Indian distinguishes as "good medicine" and "bad medicine" anything that he fancies will change his fortunes for better or for worse. Imagine that Lo is hunting an antelope and meeting with no success. Presently he finds an empty cartridge shell or the top of a tomato tin, and shortly afterwards he gets a shot at his game. Can he doubt that the piece of tin or the shell gave the luck? Not he. He wears that fragrant of tomato tin or empty shell about his neck with his other jewelry, and it is "good medicine."

Several years ago there was a Blackfoot chief who lived in the vicinity of Seven Persons River, where now stands the city of Medicine Hat. He and his tribe were fond of hunting and of making war on their enemies, the Crees. This chief always wore a headdress of feathers that he called his "medicine hat," for he thought that it brought good fortune.

It was a dark day for the chief when he lost met the Crees at the place where now stands the growing city. He and his men fell upon the enemy with great bravery, and even put them to ignominious flight. But just then a gust of wind whirled out of the west, caught the magic hat, and tossed it into the swift-running Saskatchewan River. Instantly the poor chief lost all confidence in himself and his cause, and with victory in his hand he forebore to grasp it, but fled over the plains toward the Rockies, followed by his tribe.

Will Quickly Cure Any Sour Stomach

Relieves Fullness After Meals.

"When I was working around the farm last winter, I had an attack of inflammation," writes Mr. E. P. Dawkins, of Port Richmond. "I was weak for a long time, but well enough to work until spring. But something went wrong with my bowels, for I had to use salts or physic all the time. My stomach kept sour, and after eating there was a pain and fullness, and all the symptoms of intestinal indigestion. Nothing helped me until I used Dr. Hamilton's Pills. Instead of hurting, like other pills, they acted very mildly, and seemed to heal the bowels. I did not require large doses to get results with Dr. Hamilton's Pills, and feel so glad that I have found a mild, yet certain remedy. To-day I am well—no pain, no sour stomach, a good appetite, able to digest anything. This is a whole lot of good for one medicine to do, and I can say Dr. Hamilton's Pills are the best pills, and my letter, I am sure, proves it."

Causes of Strange Worries.

How many times have you heard people say, "I know something is going to happen." They belong to that class of humans who seem to keep in a chronic state of worriment for which there is no apparent reason. Now, when you hear a person say the above quoted words, make up your mind that the cause is usually not 'something that is going to happen," but something that has actually happened, or is happening, in the patient's own system. It may be a badly working liver, a weak heart, or any of the organs, or, perhaps, some difficulty in the intestinal tract. The disorder may not give direct evidence of its existence, but still be responsible for this apparently causeless worry.

Shares Our Every Pain.

God cares. His love for each one of us is so deep, so personal, so tender, says the Rev. J. R. Miller, that He shares our every pain, every distress, every struggle. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him." God is our Father, and His care is gentler than a human love. Much human care has no power to help, but when God cares He helps omnipotently. Jesus said that when His friends would leave Him alone yet He would not be alone—"because the Father is with me." When human friendship comes not with any relief, then God will come. When no one in all the world cares, then God cares.

Getting the Cider.

Johnny was sent to the cellar to draw a pitcher of cider. When he got back the guest commended him.

"You must have good judgment to fill the pitcher so accurately in the dark without running it over."

"Aw, that ain't hard," replied Johnny. "Yer see, when the cider got up to the first joint of my thumb I stopped."

I Never Want to Be Without Them

WHAT MRS. A. AVERON SAYS OF DODD'S KIDNEY PILLS.

Alberta Lady Feels It Her Duty to Tell Her Friends of the Benefit She Has Received from Dodd's Kidney Pills.

Faith, Alberta, April 5th (Special).—"I never want to be without Dodd's Kidney Pills," so says Mrs. A. Averon, one of the oldest and most highly respected citizens of this place.

"I am an old lady, sixty-eight years of age," Mrs. Averon continues, "and had Kidney trouble for twenty years. My heart bothered me, my muscles would cramp, and my back ached. Neuralgia was added to my troubles.

"Dodd's Kidney Pills are the only medicine that have helped me, and I cannot recommend them too highly. I feel it my duty to tell my friends what Dodd's Kidney Pills did for me."

"Dodd's Kidney Pills are the favorite remedy of the old folks. They cure the Kidneys, which are the first organs of the body to feel the strain of years. By curing the Kidneys Dodd's Kidney Pills ensure pure blood and pure blood gives renewed energy all over the body. That's why the old folks say "Dodd's Kidney Pills make me feel young again."

SIX BANANAS A DAY.

Entire Tribes in African Jungles Subsist on Them.

Bananas are rich in nutriment, and because of their heretofore little cost they have been indulged in extensively by the poor, declares a food expert. They would also be more generally consumed if mothers recognized how very much "meat" there is contained in them.

In the jungles of Africa whole tribes subsist principally on bananas; they are their staple food; their bread, in fact. A savage will carry 75 pounds weight on his head, marching from sunup to sundown on a diet of six bananas a day. Just think of it, only six bananas a day, to sustain a man doing the hardest kind of work, head portage over the one-man-paths of the almost inaccessible jungles. And the men are the hardiest creatures you can imagine. As most of the African products are transported to the coast on the heads of men and women, the importance of a strengthening diet is a great one, and all big trading factories and governments allow their carriers and soldiers six bananas a day, three taken at night, when the day's march is over. The savage takes no breakfast; the latter is a civilized institution.

The Waiter Was Correct.

A customer, after waiting several minutes for an oxtail soup, called the waiter to him, and asked the reason why it was behind.

The waiter, who was Irish, gently answered:

"Oxtails are always behind, sir."

SOME HARD KNOCKS

Woman Gets Rid of Habit.

The injurious action of tea and coffee on the hearts of many persons is well known by physicians to be caused by caffeine. This is the drug found by chemists in tea and coffee.

A woman suffered a long time with severe heart trouble and finally her doctor told her she must give up coffee, as that was the principal cause of the trouble. She writes:

"My heart was so weak it could not do its work properly. My husband would sometimes have to carry me from the table, and it would seem that I would never breathe again.

"The doctor told me that coffee was causing the weakness of my heart. He said I must stop it, but it seemed I could not give it up until I was down in bed with nervous prostration.

"For eleven weeks I lay there and suffered. Finally husband brought home some Postum and I started now and right. Slowly I got well. Now I do not have any headaches, nor those spells with weak heart. We know it is Postum that helped me. The Dr. said the other day: 'I never thought you would be what you are.' I used to weigh 92 pounds and now I weigh 108.

"Postum must be prepared according to directions on pkg., then it has a rich flavour and with cream is fine."

Name given by Canadian Postum Co., Windsor, Ont. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum — must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum — is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

Both kinds are equally delicious and cost per cup about the same.

WOMAN'S WORK IN WAR TIME.

Her Duties Are Most Important During the Crisis.

Many of us who were born long enough ago to have seen the early days of what is sometimes called the Woman's Movement, are, regarding with interest the many new avenues of work which have been opened up by the war. We cannot fail to realize that many of the places formerly filled by men will now and in the near future be filled by women—this, too, for the saddest of reasons, viz., that many thousands of the flower of our young manhood will be killed in battle, killed fighting for those things which alone make life worth living.

Now, however, one of our main duties is to do what women have always done,—look after those who go forth to, and those who return wounded, from battle. In this war, the greatest the world has ever seen, the work which is especially our work is very great and will be so until the war is over. The newest addition to our responsibilities is the University of Toronto Base Hospital, which will be going to France about the middle of April. With this hospital to equip, as well as to keep supplied during the continuance of the war, our responsibilities are much increased.

The difficulties of establishing a new hospital in an at present unselected place are evident, and much unforeseen equipment may be found necessary when the hospital is opened. For this, none of us, I am sure, wish the staff, our representatives, to be hampered, and our wounded to suffer from an insufficient supply of money to buy necessary equipment.

Every woman in Canada will, I am sure, feel that she wishes to contribute in money or time to this work for our wounded; there is work for all, and none of us wish to be parasites or butterflies. Let us then work with all our energies for our "Favorite Child," taking the definition credited to an old Arab, who, upon being asked which was his favorite child, replied: "The youngest until he is grown,—the absent one till he return,—the sick one till he is well."

Good Hints.

Even in business it is well to be fired with zeal. People who rule the roost like to crow about it. He who has a bee in his bonnet often gets stung. Some people take bushels of pains to keep out of a peck of trouble. People who do things by halves secure fractional results. It is natural for a man to desire to stutter when he pronounces his own doom. Conscience may make cowards of us all, but it is the gallery that makes a lot of heroes. It is sheer nonsense to claim that truth lies at the bottom of a well. Truth never lies.

Cure for German Measles.

Recruiting Sergeant H. Chapman of the East Kent Buffs, stationed at Canterbury, Kent, England, sends to his brother in Buffalo, Chris. Chapman, the following "cure for German measles":—Mix some Woolwich powders with tincture of iron or essence of lead, and administer in pills (or shells). Have ready a little British army (a little goes a long way), some Brussels sprouts and French mustard. Add a little Canadian cheese, some Australian lambs, and season with Indian curry. Set it on a Kitchener and keep stirring until quite hot. If this does not make the patient perspire freely, rub the best Russian bear's grease on his chest, and wrap in Berlin wool. Dr. Cannon's prescription. P.S.—The patient must on no account take any "peace-soup" until the swelling in the head has quite disappeared.

AN INTERESTING CASE.

Heavy Fine Imposed on an American Railroad.

The close supervision exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission over the United States railroads is illustrated by the heavy fine imposed recently by the federal courts on the Michigan Central Railroad of $24,000 for failing to collect demurrage charges from the National Fireproofing Company. In the case of these demurrage charges the unfortunate railway is sometimes between the devil and the deep sea; for the shipper, particularly the large shipper, is often slow in paying, whereas the watchful commission, suspecting a concealed rebate, is ever threatening punishment. A fine such as the one just imposed will probably force the railroads to insist on prompt collections, and the Canadian Board of Railway Commissioners may follow suit. Shippers who have been storing their goods on freight cars at the railroad's expense will then no longer be able to escape payment by putting up excuses or playing on the fact that they are good customers of the railroad.

Tortures of Rheumatism Yield to This Remedy

A Marvel of Speed, an Unfailing Cure for Old Chronic Cases.

GET A TRIAL BOTTLE TO-DAY.

With reliable old Nerviline you can rub out the pain of Rheumatism, Sciatica, Lumbago, or Neuralgia—rub it away as completely that you feel like new all over.

It matters not how deeply seated the pain is, or how long you have had it—rubbing with the king of all liniments "Nerviline" will cure you.

Nerviline is highly concentrated—about five times stronger than the ordinary white ammonia liniment—therefore it penetrates quickly—sinks in deeply—and gets right at the core of the pain at once—draws out the lameness, takes away the stiffness—eases the joints that have hurt you so much.

Out comes the pain every time you rub on Nerviline, which contains some of the most valuable pain-subduing remedies known to science. Worth its weight in gold to every family in the land, and sure to cure the emergent and minor ills of a hundred kinds that constantly arise. Get the large 50c family size bottle; small trial size 25c. Nerviline is sold by every dealer everywhere.

The Paisley Advocate

PAISLEY, APRIL 15th, 1915

—The cow is undoubtedly a most useful friend and servant of man, but the majority of citizens of this little burg have for some time been under the impression that she shouldn't be allowed to mess up our sidewalks quite as freely as she has been doing under the tethering by-law. It's about time that her legal standing should be reduced, and her personal presence relegated to the green pasture field.

—The daylight saving movement seems to be gaining ground. Cleveland, O., and Regina, Sask., are two cities in which the business and work day is started an hour earlier in summer than in winter, and, of course, ends an hour earlier, allowing people a longer evening. London, Ont., has also decided to adopt the plan, and the city council has ordered the preparation of a by-law establishing the new order. What's the matter with Paisley and every other Bruce county town and village setting into this line of progress?

—"Craigie"—Agnes Bowes Hall's book at McArthur's $1.25.

—Christopher Maloney, employed with Mr. H. Rudolph, Bleen road north, met with an accident on Thursday from which he was fortunate to escape alive. He and Mr. Rudolph's son had mounted a pair of harnessed horses and were starting back to the logging bush, when the steeds took fright at the rattling of some empty tin pails they were carrying. The horses ran away, when Maloney was thrown off, his feet caught in the harness and he was dragged to the house, where the horses stopped. He was badly bruised about the head and otherwise injured, but is now on the mend.

—Mrs. W. D. Cameron, of Mankota, writes in remitting her subscription for 1915: "I could not think of doing without THE ADVOCATE. It is my weekly letter from Bruce, and sometimes its news makes me sad when I read of so many of those I have known passing away. The old pioneers will soon all have gone to their reward. We have had the finest winter I have seen since I came west. The cattle and horses have lived out all winter and it has helped out the farmers who had only a small supply of feed, enabling them them to save it for the spring work. Last year was a very hard year for the homesteaders, on account of the drought. I do hope we get more rain this year and that there will be a good crop."

—The Toronto Globe says "Craigie" is a gripping story. McArthur has it $1.25

—Two detectives employed by the Provincial License Department struck town on March 5th and succeeded in making trouble for Mr W J Hills, of the Central Hotel, by giving information that the latter had violated the local option by-law by selling them real aqua fortis. A charge was accordingly laid by Provincial Inspector Ayerst, and prosecuted by that officer on Tuesday of this week before Magistrates J C Gibson and D Ballachey. The men who claimed to have been served with black-bottle wet goods over the Central bar are Messrs Hisch and Hunter. Their evidence as to sale of whiskey was flatly contradicted by Mr Hills and Mr Robt Adams, who was on that date tending bar. Another witness examined was Mr Service, also a provincial officer, who was here on March 24th and found on the work board of the Central bar a bottle that had contained whiskey, but in which there remained only a dreg sufficiently perceptible to allow the court and counsel to greatly partake of a smell. There was positively no intoxication following this indulgence, but there was no denying it was "whusky." As to how the bottle came to be there no evidence was submitted, and it remains a subject for speculation. Counsel for defence argued that it probably was left there by a commercial traveller. The magistrates took time to review and consider the evidence enchamber, but could not agree in a verdict upon the evidence, therefore there is no conviction. Counsel for prosecution, O R Mayo, of Walkerton; for defendant, H G Tucker, of Owen Sound.

MRS. JAS. FLETT

On Tuesday the grave covered over another of the aged mothers of Greenock in the person of Mrs. Jas. Flett, who passed away on Saturday at the home of her only son, Mr. Wm. Flett, 14th con. The maiden name of the deceased was Jane Houston, and she was the last of eleven brothers and sisters, a number of whom were among the pioneer settlers of the gore township. She was a native of Orkney, Scotland, and after coming to Canada lived first in Ramsay Tp., but in 1856 came up to her brothers in Greenock. Subsequent to her marriage she and her husband lived in Ramsay for a time. Since their return to the late Miles they occupied the farm purchased. Mr. Flett predeceased her about a year. The family surviving are two daughters—Mrs. John Cruickshank, of Greenock, Mrs. Hutton, in Saskatchewan, and the one son Willi am. The funeral took place on Monday afternoon to Purdy's cemetery. The deceased was 83 years of age.

MRS. HUGH McFADYEN

There passed away on Monday, March 22nd, 1915, at her home on the boundary, one of the pioneers of Kincardine Tp. in the person of Mrs. Hugh McFadyen. Her health had not been robust for a long time and at her advanced age her death came as no shock to her many friends. She was one of the charter members of the Baptist Church, Clavels, and through all of the many years of her association with it her life was one of continuous testimony to the Christ whom she loved and that life was never more beautiful than in its evening hour. She is survived by five children, Mrs. Atkinson, Hugh and Gideon of Manitoba, Mary and Neil at home. The remains were laid to rest in Tiverton cemetery while the memory of a beautiful Christian life is left to cheer the loved ones who follow on.

MRS DONALD SINCLAIR

Death gathered home another old resident on Tuesday morning, April 6th, when Mrs D Sinclair, a noble christian woman, was called to her eternal rest. The deceased, who was in her 82nd year, enjoyed splendid health up till a few years ago when she happened with an accident which left her confined to her room ever since. Although she was not able to leave the house she enjoyed fairly good health up till last fall when she had a severe spell of sickness and since that time the physical frame gradually failed and without ache or pain she passed into the great beyond. The subject of this sketch, whose maiden name was Mary McKechnie, was of Highland descent birth, a native of Colonsay. At thirteen years of age she emigrated with her parents, four brothers and one sister to Canada, living for a time in the township of Chinguacousy. At the age of 17 she was married at Montreal to Mr Donald Sinclair, who resided in Arthur township near Mount Forest. In the year 1877 they removed to this county and settled in the township of Bruce on lot 29, con 10, where they spent the remainder of their lives. Mr Sinclair having predeceased her 23 years ago. The family consisted of thirteen children, of whom eight are living—Neil, at Calling Lake; Archie, on the homestead, Malcolm, Mrs J Storey, Mrs Wm McConnell and Mrs Thos Gray, in Toronto; Mrs John McInnes, 10th Bruce, and Dan at Duluth. The funeral was conducted by Rev Mr McKeown of Paisley Baptist church, an organization of which she had been a lifelong member. Interment was made in Sark Vale cemetery in the presence of a large number of friends who came to pay their last respects to the departed. The sympathy of the community goes out to the family in the hour of their bereavement.

In a near and silent graveyard,
Where the trees their branches wave,
Lies a dear and loving mother
In her cold and silent grave.

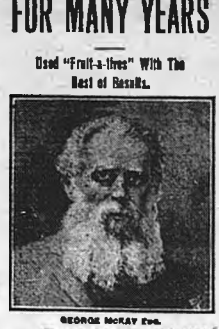
The flowers we lay upon her grave
May wither and decay,
But the love for her who sleeps beneath
Will never fade away.

JOHN C. McKENZIE

The death of John C. McKenzie in his 79th year occurred at the home of his brother-in-law, Mr. D J McArthur, Kincardine Township, on Sunday the 4th inst. Deceased was one of the best known farmers in the town-ships of Kincardine and Bruce, and it hardly seems possible to realize that he has passed away, he having been around his daily duties in the best of spirits and apparent good health only a few weeks ago. He was taken down at his home and was not feeling well, but no serious results were anticipated. During his indisposition about the middle of March his mother was very low and he went to the home of his brother-in law, Mr. D. J. McArthur, where his mother was staying, to see her. While there a complication of diseases seized the deceased and he was unable to be removed to his home. All that medical skill could do was of no avail and he passed away. Mr. McKenzie was a native of the township of Kincardine, having been born on the B line. He was one of the most prosperous and hustling farmers in the district. He was a prominent figure at the Tiverton and Kincardine Agricultural Societies' annual fairs, being a director on the board of each of these societies. To him for years had been assigned the duty of assisting the judges in the horse ring. Of a genial and kindly disposition he made friends readily and was greatly liked by all who knew him. He was of Scotch descent and an adherent of the Tiverton Presbyterian Church, having served on the board for a number of years. In politics he was a Liberal and a strong supporter of Mr. John Tolmie on all occasions. He married Miss Minnie Kinmond of Bruce, who, with two small children, is left to mourn his loss.—Reporter.

ARCHIBALD MacLACHLAN

One of the very last of the early pioneers of Arran township in the person of Archibald MacLachlan passed away at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich, on April 5th, and was buried in Port Elgin cemetery last Wednesday. The deceased was born in Lanarkshire Tp 85 years ago. When but a young man of 24, in the year 1854, he came to Arran. All was in forest then and he cut the first tree on the farm upon which he settled. Four years after going there he married Janet Brown. There they lived for over twenty years. In 1878 he moved to the 7th con Elderslie. After over twenty years' residence there he retired to Port Elgin, and about ten years ago he went to Sault St Marie, where a number of his family resided. For many years, while in Elderslie, he was laid aside by spinal trouble. During the active years of his life he was always interested in every movement that made for the betterment of life. In the Sunday school he found scope for his activities, acting for years as superintendent of a school both in Arran and Elderslie. In religion he was a Baptist. The cause of his death was general debility and old age. The members of the family are: James and Williams, Mrs Edward Pearce and Miss Bel McLachlan, at Sault St Marie; Mrs W J Davis, Regina; Rev J D., of Strathroy; C. S., of Calgary; and Fred S., of Paisley.



SAMUEL GORDON

After an illness of considerable length, Mr. Samuel Gordon, of Con. B, Greenock, passed away on Saturday night. The deceased had been a resident on the B line for 58 years. He was born in Armagh Co., Ireland, and when seven years of age his parents and family came across the sea to seek a home in Canada. They settled in Amaranth Tp., near Orangeville, where Mr Gordon grew up to manhood. He married Miss Kate Mansfield and they lived in Glenelch Tp for some time before removing to the farm in Greenock. Mr Gordon was a most industrious and honorable man respected by all who knew him. He is survived by Mrs Gordon, one daughter and two sons—Miss Ida and Herbert at home, and Wesley in Belleville. The funeral took place on Tuesday afternoon to Stark Vale cemetery, the services being conducted by Rev Mr Facey, the deceased having been connected with the Methodist congregation.

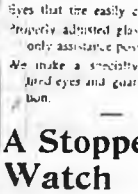
A Stopped Watch

One that will not go AT ALL,—doesn't cause as much bother as one that runs now fast, now slow, in an erratic fashion.



The first you don't pretend to depend upon—the other is a constant source of annoyance.

Most people can afford a watch, but no one can afford an uncertain fast and slow one.

And when our repair department is so close at hand there is really no excuse for carrying anything but an accurate time-piece, no matter what the first cost was.

Consult us about any watch troubles that may arise.

It Multiplies Power.

The telephone, like the crane, multiplies power.

The telephone increases personal efficiency and enlarges the volume of business by extending the field of the merchant's activity.

If the modern business man had to travel every time it was necessary to have a personal talk with a customer or business associate, he would be in the position of a builder without a crane.

Are you using the telephone as you should—systematically applying it to the needs of your business?

The telephone, especially the long distance service, makes possible real economy, and with it a greater, not a lower, efficiency. A careful study of the subject will repay you.

—Scene—A smoking compartment in a Pullman car. Old gent (to Pat)—"Young man, allow me to inform you that out of every ten cases of men suffering from paralysis of the tongue nine are due to smoking." Pat—"Sorr, allow me to infor-rum you that out of every ten men suffering from broken noses, nine are due to the habit o' not minding their own business."

—The bar-room is hard to defend, says the Guelph Mercury, and it mentions the case of a woman who stood before a magistrate trying to get her husband released on the fourth charge of drunkenness against him. The magistrate sympathized with the woman. "I am sorry," he said, "but I must lock up your husband." She did not seem one who would be a deep thinker, but there was wisdom in her quiet reply: "Your honor, wouldn't it be better for me and the children if you locked up the liquor and let my husband go to work?"

—"A Book of Scotch Humor" illustrates anew of a native of Annandale the saying that a prophet is not without honor save in his own country. "I ken them a'," said the rustic speaking of the Carlyles. "fock's a doctor aboot London. Tam's a harem-scarem kind o' chiel, an' wrestes books an' that. But Jamie—you's his farm you see owre yonder—Jamie's the man o' that family, min' I'm tellin' ye, an' I'm prood to say I ken him. Jamie Carlyle, sir, feeds the best swine that ecome into Dumfries market."

—After a decade of experimenting, a Hull, Que., scientist claims he has found a substitute for gasoline and at a test before several officials of the Public Works Department two tablespoonfuls of the liquid, mixed with two quarts of water, proved sufficient to run a 3½ horsepower engine for an hour and a half without stoppage. The discoverer, who is Mr. Gideon Charbonneau, of Hull, claims he will be able to manufacture the liquid, which he calls "charbo-oil," in any quantity at four cents per gallon. The liquid does not give off any smoke, and the inventor asserts it will revolutionize the automobile and other industries.

—That a hunting knife is too dangerous a weapon for any storekeeper to sell without a permit from the police, is the decision of Police Magistrate Creasor of Owen Sound. The decision was given in the case brought by the Crown against a clerk in Thompson's hardware store for selling the knife to Herbert Klug with which the boy Eddie Nicholson was killed three weeks ago. A fine of $5 was imposed. The statutes provides that certain classes of knives must not be sold without a permit from the police. An appeal is being entered against the magistrate's decision in this case, on the grounds that a hunting knife is not a weapon of offense.

AGRICULTURAL BULLETINS

So great has been the demand for bulletins, pamphlets, records and reports upon the Publications Branch of the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa, as a result of the Patriotism and Production movement, that it has been found impossible to comply with all the applications as promptly as could be desired. Of some of the bulletins the supply has been exhausted, and no time has been afforded for reprinting, while of others the quantity asked for individually has been such that instant compliance would mean many applicants might have to go without. This has meant extra correspondence and consequent delay. The situation is, of course, satisfactory as indicating the success of the campaign, and the widespread interest created, but the inability to respond on the instant with the multitude of applications is greatly regretted. At the same time it is impossible that the size of the demand could have been foreseen. As fast as possible the requests will be attended to, but in the meantime there will have to be reprinting and in cases revising. To such circumstances patience seems to be a desirable and necessary quality.

—One of the items of business with which the South Bruce License Commissioners will have to deal with at their meeting this month will be a petition which is being circulated by Mr. Adam Knox, proprietor of the Pinkerton hotel, asking that a license be given to that hostelry. In view of the fact that the temperance question is now so much before the public, and that the sale of intoxicating liquors is slowly but surely being stamped out, not only in Canada but throughout the world, we would deem Mr. Knox's efforts to secure a license wasted energy, for under the present circumstances there is no doubt but that the judicious commissioners of South Bruce will refuse to grant his request.—Telescope.

—The clerk of Derby Township, Wm. Beaton, has resigned after holding the office for nearly half a century. His record is surpassed by the venerable clerk of Amabel Township, R. H. Murray, who passed away a few days ago. Mr Murray was present at the last nomination, which was the fifty-fifth he had attended in an official way.

THE CRUEL OLD KAISER

The cruel old Kaiser they call the war lord
Delights in his murders and weilding the sword,
But God in his justice will mete out to him,
When the troops of the Allies will march through Berlin.

The cruel old Kaiser, his heart's full of spleen;
To conquer all Europe it is his foul scheme,
But Belgium and France will cause him to dance,
And Britain will give him the gun.

The war is still raging that Kaiser begun,
And his spike headed soldiers will soon have to run,
When millions of Allies will onto him pour,
He will throw up his hands and fight us no more.

The cruel old Kaiser, the despotic miser,
In vain would he add to his board:
The lion and bear will give him a scare,
And Belgium will give him the sword.

The women of Belgium and orphans forlorn
Are objects of pity and Germany's scorn;
But God in his mercy will care for them all,
While the cruel old Kaiser he surely will fall.

DOCTORS DID NOT HELP HER

But Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound Restored Mrs. Bradley's Health—Her Own Statement.

Winnipeg, Canada. — "Eleven years ago I went to the Victoria Hospital, Montreal, suffering with a growth. The doctors said it was a tumor and could not be removed as it would cause instant death. They found that my organs were affected, and said I could not live more than six months in the condition I was in.

"After I came home I saw your advertisement in the paper, and commenced taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I took it constantly for two years, and still take it at times, and both my husband and myself claim that it was the means of saving my life. I highly recommend it to suffering women."—Mrs. ORILLA BRADLEY, 254 Johnson Ave., Winnipeg, Manitoba, Can.

Why will women take chances or drag out a sickly, half-hearted existence, missing three-fourths of the joy of living, when they can find health in Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound?

For thirty years it has been the standard remedy for female ills, and has restored the health of thousands of women who have been troubled with such ailments as displacements, inflammation, ulceration, tumors, irregularities, etc.

If you want special advice write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co. (confidential) Lynn, Mass. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman, and held in strict confidence.

CHAPTER XVII.—(Continued).

"What is the meaning of this?" Sir Randolph demanded, holding up the necklace before his wife's eyes. By the way those eyes faltered and flinched, turning aside from contemplation of the jewels, Christine knew that something must be very wrong—that, indeed, something of truth must lie at the bottom of the wrath of her father and the conscious dread that looked out from her mother's faded eyes.

"I ask you what is the meaning of this?" said her father's stern voice again and then he proceeded to explain, looking full the while into the once beautiful eyes that now drooped guiltily under his gaze.

The morning, a man came to see me by appointment concerning the purchase for many thousands of pounds of this necklace and of the rest of the diamonds which I had bought to go down to our descendants as family heirlooms. You can understand that it took me a pretty deal of courage to make up my mind to get rid of those things which I had meant to be treasured; but we are in immediate and desperate need of money and there is no help for it. The sum of money which they were to bring was large enough to have put us on our legs again for many years, even at our present rate of living. So the man who was going to buy them came here about an hour ago, and the arrangement was in course of being satisfactorily completed when the man discovered that the jewels were not what they were represented to be. He discovered that they had been tampered with—that the real gems had been removed and presumably sold, and paste substituted for them so that they might not be missed. The thing has been very cleverly done, so cleverly, indeed, that it is a wonder that the man didn't take them as they were—of course, taking my word as to their genuineness—and bring me up for fraud when he had conferred with Streeter afterwards. A nice thing that would have been! A fine thing, but not much worse than the present state of things, in which I discover my wife to be not only a dishonorable woman, but a cunning dishonorable woman. It is of no use for you to attempt to deny that the substitution was your work; no one else could have done it, or could even have had a hand in it."

"No one else had a hand in it. It was all my work. I caused it to be done. It was wrong, I know—wrong and dishonorable. But I was in such need of money that I did it. I told the dealers who sold them I had not the courage to tell you. I did not know that you were contemplating selling them. If I had known I would have guarded you against the risk of discovering any one, and against the risk of discovering the truth in the unpleasant and humiliating manner.

"To whom have you sold them? And for how much?" Christine, dumb with consternation, heard her father rest.

"I sold them a few weeks ago to Mrs. Crocksenden for $75,000."

"$75,000! and to Mrs. Crocksenden!" Sir Randolph stood as if petrified, staring at his wife. "That was not half enough. But still it is a large sum of money. What did you do with it? Did you pay your milliner's bill?"

Lady Dare began to tremble visibly.

"No," she responded faintly. "I have only used $25,000 of the sum as yet. And that $25,000 is as much as I have actually received, the other $50,000 to be paid to me later. I can tell you no more than this. I can only say that at the time my need for money—money that I could handle—was really desperate."

Sir Randolph darted at her a lightning look that would have shrivelled her if it had had power to shrink. Then he sat down and stared helplessly at the open leather case and at the glittering rows of shoddy gems which he had opened wrathfully and disgustedly into it. Christine had crossed the floor to her mother's side, and was supporting that unhappy mother with all the strength of her tender young arms.

"Don't say any more angry words to her, father," she pleaded with eyes and voice together; "she is not strong enough to bear them. Can't you see how ill she is and how weak? She is almost fainting."

Sir Randolph sat with and went out of the open jewel case, with its paste stone gems, and presently rose from the mass of shoddy stuff. He lay in a jumble on the floor, where he in his haste emptied the jewel case, and was bringing to his feet.

Timothy Scott looked at his master with a wondering reproach which said as plainly as dumb expression could say it that servants of the gentry and aristocracy were accustomed to see their masters behave after the ostentatious manner of the untutored common rack of mankind who knew no better. The jewels had been knocked off the salver, and he stooped and picked it up, and then proceeded slightly to give it to whom it was addressed. This was Christine, who had set her mother sit down in a chair and its back in and rest, while words of tenderness and comfort were whispered in her ear.

"I wanted the money to give to him!" Lady Dare was whispering back in a faint voice that had deepened to a sob. "He said he would go away to Australia for ever if I would give him £5,000. He swore to me that he would go, and that he would never come back. But when I gave him the money he only laughed, and said it wasn't likely he was going unless I guaranteed him a large fixed income that would make it worth while for him to stay out of my way. I saw then, and I see now, that I was only a fool to imagine that any bribe short of a great fortune would make him cease from persecuting me. The ten thousand pounds that I have yet to be paid me for the diamonds will go as the first £5,000 has gone; that is, if your father does not succeed in spending Mrs. Crocksenden to pay over the remaining money direct to himself. It was she who put it into my head to sell the jewels and get rid of their abstraction with the substitution of paste. I should never have thought of doing it else; and then, because it had me under her foot, it was close to put that from down, she made me promise that if the necessity should arise for mortgaging this property, it should be mortgaged to her.

She stopped to take breath, and then narrated again

how the day when the transaction about the jewels was arranged between ... thought it read in her face a betrayal to me a family, a certain malignity against her desire to exterminate to root and branch. This must have been imagination, for what reason can she possibly have for feeling so toward us? And yet it is true since we have known her that we have been sinking down, down, every month, every week, every day. It is since we have known her that all the calamities have come—the death of Hector, the death of Ronald—all—

The arrival of the butler in front of her chair checked her abruptly. Timothy Scott was presenting the salver, with the letter upon it, to Christine. It was a letter which had evidently not come by post, for it bore no stamp; the handwriting on the envelope was scrawly. Yet there was something about the writing which led Christine Dare to take up the missive quickly with a feeling of sudden trepidation at her heart.

"Who is it from?" inquired her mother, raising herself in her chair.

"I do not know yet, mother," the daughter answered, keeping her face slightly averted so that the quiver of her lips, whence she felt the blood slowly ebbing, might not be noticed. She had spoken the truth when she said she did not know from whom the letter had come. For the thought that had come into her mind concerning it, and had made her heart beat slower, had been a wild thought and utterly impossible. The dead cannot send messages to the living, and it was the hand of her lately dead brother which had addressed the letter to her in the scrawly words which formed the superscription on the outside of this envelope.

Walking a few paces apart, she opened the envelope and unfolded the letter which she found inside it. Here, on a small sheet of odd paper, a very few lines were jerkily written; the pen with which the lines had been traced had evidently been scratchy, and the ink grey enough and insufficient enough to harmonize with the yellowish tint of the paper. But the words. The girl whose eyes devoured them could hardly believe in the accuracy of her own sight, in the top of the sheet of paper there was an address—the house number, name of street, and name of the district. Then followed these words in jumbled and almost unde-

"Christine, come to me, for the love of ... I am dying here in this wretched corner of London where the poor have to die. Never mind what I have done or left undone; try to forget all that, and to remember only that you are my sister, and that I need you.

Ronald."

When Ronald her eyes had studied this signature, the girl stood mute and as utterly rigid as if a judgment had overtaken her, and overwhelmed her. Ronald! How could Ronald be now dying when, according to public report, he had gone to his last account more than a fortnight ago? Was this letter of pleading indeed true, or could it only be a cruel trick devised in some malignant brain by some people? Little more than a fortnight ago, and just before the report had been spread abroad of the death of Sir Randolph Dare's second son, the worthless debtor, who had given up London in search for her unhappy brother in certain localities pointed out to her by Mr. Hopkins. Where Mr. Hopkins was likely to be met with. The worthy old servant had told her about the unscrupulous lawyer, lately made a friend and ship, and the disreputable doings which had been concealed behind a pretence of honest commerce in a certain street in Camden Town. He had told her of her search with Mr. Hopkins, and what had inspired thereat, and how the young master had said he was not ill to come home and meet his mother's unhappiness, and with them, saying no word to either father or mother, the dear brother had gone off to the metropolis for several days, staying at the house of a great lady whose name the knighted servant had given, and dating forth from that house early every morning to wander about aerial and untold streets, where faces such as he were rarely seen, and where lawlessness occasionally prevailed to such an extent as to make a policeman's presence desirable, when she might have been unable to summon courage sufficient to carry on a lonely search in districts so mean and so evil. The newspaper reports of Ronald Dare's death from the result of a long, direct accident had soon put an end to her brave mission. The dead man who had been killed and to be ... Randolph Dare's disowned son had been buried as a pauper, and the inches left long bitter against him in many ... Christine had heard in her father's ... and every inquiries into the proofs of the unhappy boy's identity, or into the details of the accident which had cut him off in the first blossoming of his youth. The family solicitor had been deputed to attend to these matters; but he must have performed the part of his business very carelessly and inexpeditiously if the message which now summoned Christine to her dying brother's bedside should prove to be a hoax.

"I must go—I must go," Christine repeated to herself forcibly. Her mother had ceased to question her about the letter, and was talking instead of the diamonds, parading her knowledge of them, understand how great the need and the terror had been which had driven her so to tamper with them. In her trouble and perplexity she was so easy to lead as a little child. Christine drew her away, and upstairs to her own sitting-room, and, having seen her settled there to rest for an hour, went quite fast herself to get ready for starting on her journey to the bedside of the brother who had called on her to him.

In the hall, on her way to the dog-cart which she had ordered to be ready for her, she encountered the butler and paused a moment to speak to him.

"Simkins, we have all been mistaken about Mr. Ronald's death. I believe that he is not dead, although he is very ill. I am going to his bedside, and I may be away one. Perhaps, under the blessing of God, he may still be spared to us. We will pray that it may be so."

And the elderly manservant was still standing rigid with amazement when the sound of travelling hoofs and of rolling wheels told him that his young mistress had gone.

CHAPTER XVIII.

It was night—a rainy night in London, with flaring yellow gaslights reflected in the dirty water of the street puddles — when Christine Dare alighted from a hansom outside the door of a miserable-looking tenement house in a narrow side street, whose wet gutters were crowded with urchins who should have been abed hours before, and whose young lips gave out evil language as they quarrelled noisily in an argument given out water. Groups of men and women stood about on the uneven pavement of the illsmelling alley, for the place was no better than an alley, though it boasted the name of a street. One of these women, whose face was one to shrink from in a crowded room, offered to give the strange young lady any help she needed in the matter of finding whom she sought, the house she wanted to get into, and whomsoever she wished to discover when she should have got in.

Very obligingly did this self-appointed guide climb the rickety staircase of the premises which answered to the number 66. Her help was especially valuable by reason of the fact that neither the door nor any other part of the front of the house bore any marks which could be construed into an indication of that number. After penetrating to the interior of the house, down a narrow passage, and subsequently by a long, damp passage to the basement of Eighe, in spite of the fact that the overcrowding of the rooted door made the avoidance of such ... quite impossible, the dirty, ill-favored girl went on. The staircase was worse, and she shut her lips tightly, and would have stifled back that her nostrils as she confronted the almost ... disagreeable smells that met her and made the dark, damp atmosphere almost unbreathable. And Ronald Dare, the handsome boy who had been brought up in the lap of wealth, who had been to Eton and Cambridge, and afterwards as ... riders, had led the most fashionable and elegant of lives at his father's expense—was now here, sick and perhaps dying, in this wretched haunt of the unfortunate and the vicious!

Christine attained the third floor at last, and, discovering the room occupied by the particular lodger who bore the name of Hopkins, she knocked at the door with a doubt as to whether, indeed, it would be her brother whom she would see when she entered. But when Christine found that she begged her unkempt and disreputable companion to stay with her a few moments longer, in case of any protestation against the possibility of the man within proving to be not Ronald but an impostor. The woman consented, having been rendered amiable by the present of a shilling, and when the door was flung ... followed Christine into the room, and was told quickly that she might go down again, for that the ... ragged figure and dress alike made her so strange a visitor to such a rat-burrow as was that house, had ... covered by the faint light in a sputtering tallow candle, stuck in a ... candlestick, that the man lying on the ragged-looking bed in that basement room was in veritable truth the dear brother for whom she had shed so many bitter tears during the fortnight that had passed since news had come to Eglinton that death had taken him from them for ever.

"Ronald! Ronald!"

Her arms were already about him, and she was covering his face with kisses and ... repeating his name with passionate gladness, and, with tears streaming down her cheeks, heard him whisper between his sobs: "I thank God that you are living!" she went on, tightening her clasp of him. "This is indeed a joy and answer to my prayers!"

"Then you don't utterly despise me, Christine?" she heard him falter forth, with sharp pain in his voice and in his low tones.

"No—no," the sister panted forth in answer. "It has been terrible, and we have all suffered cruelly. But it was not all my fault. I—I was unjust and more than tempted, sorrow misled. But now, when you are better, you will tell me all about it; and then I will tell you more than enough, to know that you are living and ... Now that I have found you again, I will never let you go, never let you fall back."

In the light shed by one humble tallow candle she saw him shake his head.

"I shall never be better, Christine. This is my death-bed. I shall never rise from it."

His words sent a chill through her, but she would not believe that they were true.

"You think so because you feel very ill," she replied quickly. "But we will have a great doctor for you, and then you will get better and feel confident and hopeful. And, Ronald, you must not ... should give way to despair here in this misery. Oh, Ronald! we should have been so happy if you should have come to this! But as soon as you can be moved we will take you home, and then—"

He interrupted her by raising himself upon his elbow, and, lifting a finger to check her words:

"Christine, dear, it's of no use. I know I'm dying. If I hadn't known it I would not have sent for you. You don't imagine how bitter it is to me that you should see me here, like this. I had many a battle with myself before I sent that message to you. But there is a soul to be saved—another soul—and I have prayed and have summoned you to ask you to save it."

Still with her arms clasped about him, clasped so that they raised his dear head and pillowed it against her breast, the girl cried out: "Ronald, you are practically into his burning eyes.

"Did you mean that you would not have called out here for my own sake for my sake and the sake of our father and mother? Ronald you have been cruel enough to let us grieve for you as dead—you, our pride and our hearts delight—while you were living, and could come and cry our tears! Oh, Ronald, if you could only know what it meant to us to think of you as dead; what it still means to my mother, who does not yet know that you are living, you would never for a moment have allowed this terrible mistake, or lie to crush us as it has crushed us. You think I do not love you still, but a well ... I was searching for you, unhelped and ... unprotected, in two of the poorest districts in London. Something that Nobby told me set me searching. I nearly broke my heart ... through ... but I found you, whatever has happened, we are one family still. Your mother is your mother still; your father is still your father; and I am still your sister."

The boy's head—for he was ... yet hardly more than a boy—moved inwardly against her shoulder.

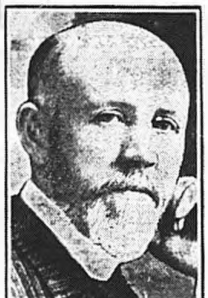
PROF. ADAM SHORTT.

Since Youth His One Real Interest Has Been Economy Study.



Prof. Adam Shortt, of the Civil Service Commisson at Ottawa, is generally described as "Canada's leading political economist."

Prof. Shortt was born in an old Ontario mill village called Kilworth, on the banks of the Thames, near London. His father was a miller. Later the village disappeared altogether, although another hamlet which sprang up some miles distant bears the name Kilworth Bridge. As a boy the coming political economist was a hard worker. He was a good student at the High School at Walkerton, and he "put himself through" Queen's, as most university students did in those days, by teaching school. After graduation at Queen's he went, in 1884, to Scotland and took post-graduate work at Glasgow and Edinburgh Universities, repeating his record at Queen's by becoming in each institution a medalist in philosophy. His long vacations he spent tramping through Great Britain and continental Europe picking up first-hand knowledge of Old World social and industrial conditions. His interest steadily concentrated on political economy, and, returning to Canada, he was, in 1889, appointed lecturer in political science at Queen's, and three years later he became professor in the same subject. The chair eventually being endowed by the late Sen tor Gowan and other admirers of Sir John A. Macdonald, whose name it bears.

Meantime, in 1886, Prof. Shortt married Elizabeth Smith, M.D., who has herself become w ll known for her services in directing the interests of Canadian women into helpful channels.

His Books.

Prof. Shortt is a well-known writer on economic and historical subjects. Some years ago he contributed to the Journal of the Canadian Bankers' Association a series of articles on the development of the Canadian banking and currency systems which represented an immense amount of research and which were much discussed. Perhaps his best-known contribution to current problems is his "Imperial Preferential Trade from a Canadian Point of View," a study of the British fiscal situation. It revealed his belief in freedom of trade, coupled with recognition of the fact that wide variations of industrial and social conditions make it impossible to maintain that any one fiscal system is expedient for all times and places, and also his faith in the efficiency of autonomy as the only enduring basis of Imperial co-operation and unity.

Prof. Adam Shortt.

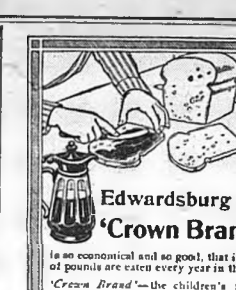
In his Life of Lord Sydenham in "The Makers of Canada" series, Prof. Shortt describes the course of events in the tumultuous years of the establishment of responsible government in Canada. In collaboration with Dr. Doughty, the Dominion Archivist, he edited a collection of constitutional documents on the period from 1763 to 1791, many of which are made accessible for the first time. A second volume deals with the period from 1791 to 1841. These worked-to the selection of Prof. Shortt and Dr. Doughty as joint editors of a new ten-volume history of Canada.



When the first Labor Commission was formed under the Lemieux Act, Prof. Shortt was appointed chairman, his colleagues being Wallace Nesbitt and J. G. Dorchue, to apply the Act in the dispute in April, 1907, between the Grand Trunk Railway and its machinists.

In 1908 Prof. Shortt was appointed one of the Civil Service Commissioners under the new Act, the idea being to take a step forward in the direction of the abolition of the patronage system, to "take the civil service out of politics."

Of late years Prof. Shortt has done a good deal of speaking at Canadian clubs and other gatherings. They say he never reads a novel. His chief hobbies are gardening and wood carving.

In 1911 he was created a companion of St. Michael and St. George in the Coronation favors.

HOW PARIS WAS SAVED BY THE ENGLISH.

The inside facts about the famous retreat from Mons in Belgium, are slowly coming out as the war progresses. "Retreat" is a word which no Englishman likes to pronounce, but it has gained an honorable meaning by recent exploits.

The retreat of General French and his army from Mons, is, one of the grandest and most brilliant military achievements in the world's history. It adds a brand new page to British gallantry, and puts the name of Sir John French on the highest pinnacle for military accomplishments.

The charge of the Germans against his little army was the mightiest and fastest cyclone of the great struggle — that sweep towards Paris beats anything the annals of war have ever known. The Allies and Germans had just touched "mits," in the parlance of pugilistic nomenclature, before the onslaught began, and then the enemy with overwhelming numbers and equipment, rushed in with a tornado of blows they had been saving up for over forty years.

Germany had calculated that this first round would be a knock-out, and probably no army in all history has ever taken the beating and lived through the milling, keeping its legs and head, as did the English army through the thirteen awful days in which the Germans put in their lightning strokes.

It was an all but irresistable onslaught. If General French had stood his ground and fought, in all probability it would have been a clean knock-out, for he had greatly inferior numbers, if he ran it would be a complete rout and probably annihilation.

Foot-work and a cool head, sidestepping and protecting his body would have been the tactics of a great ring fighter. French followed these tactics exactly. But the thing that makes Britain gasp, and will make the world wonder when apprised of the details of that great retreat from Mons, was not a prize fight, but the most frantic and terrible rush of the greatest and best disciplined army the world has ever known. For a man to have kept his head in all that, as if the event were a mere prize fight, with only a knock-out at stake, instead of the annihilation of 80,000 men, is the thing that the world will wonder at. It was on August 22, 1914 that the English and Germans first met in battle at Mons, the English having only arrived on the scene the day before, and were informed by the French that "There are not more than two German corps in front of you." General French and his men had just come to the scene and he had taken the Frenchmen's word for it. Sunday afternoon came the surprise. A courier brought a message to General French from Joffre, the French Generalissimo. It said in effect; "Four German army corps are coming up against you. We have fallen back." The strong French line had gone and was 30 miles in the rear. French's army of 80,000 held out against the oncoming tide of Germans.

Ten thousand Custer Massacres all rolled into one were not hard on a nut such as history has never before known. Some must stay and fight, while the others fall back and prepare the trenches. The herculean task may be realized when we consider that there was artillery to move and thousands of tons of supplies and ammunition to be transported in autos.

There were horses to save, and the roads would hold only so much traffic, and there must be no jams, cool heads must plan it all. Some must fall far behind and dig trenches, so that the retreating army could hide and put up their daily and nightly fight with the Germans.

Others must have time to eat and sleep, and the wounded must be taken care of. All these things were done perfectly and no general in history ever had such a perilous retreat to direct. General French was dashing about everywhere in his auto, and measuring the physical force his little army had left. He knew not only the exact strength of his own army but the strength of his opponent as well.

The lightning blows sent in by the Germans were terrific, the Ninth Lancers were mowed down like grass, the 8th Hussars were almost wiped out. Bullets flew around General French as around the most ordinary soldier. For thirteen days in this great running battle, he kept his men as coolheaded almost as himself. At last the English reached the Marne.

This gave them a chance for much needed rest, but the Germans were tired out, to. The cool foot-work of the English had exhausted them, they were tired out trying to hit the tiny foe which always eluded their blows.

The German general, Von Kluck, made his mistake, he turned his flank to the English, intending to pass before them, and move over to join the army of the German Crown Prince and advance on Paris. French was watching, and saw that Von Kluck had dropped his guard and he popped his jaw, and the lightning English counter, the man whose fists were armies, struck like a flash. The Germans, off their guard, received a blow they could not parry. They lost hundreds of big guns and thousands of men. The French were doing their part, 60,000 soldiers in taxicabs and motor cars, came back up the English, but General French's blow had taken the nerve all out of the Germans, and their retreat became an ignoble rout. Thus was Paris saved and the German plans completely frustrated by a mere handful of England's first expeditionary force.

Good Habits.

A good habit is harder to form and easier to give up than a bad habit, and this is evidence to me of the depravity of the human heart. A good habit requires self-denial, moral courage and manliness to acquire; an evil habit is formed by just yielding to the feeling of pleasure, without principle, without cost.—John B. Gough.

The Trawler's Sweetheart

I.

As the girl stood looking down over the low stone wall into the deep hollow beneath, the knitting-needles in her brown hands kept up a steady clicking, and glistened in the pale sunshine.

It was a familiar and everyday scene, and she watched without curiosity. A faded red flag jerked itself to the summit of the flagpole above the scarred face of the quarry, and a bugle uttered a thin note of warning. Then tiny human figures appeared—little toy men, running with a ridiculous show of haste, like startled ants—and disappeared. A white billow of smoke heaved itself lazily against the grey ridge of the workings, and the faint, far-away boom of an explosion came up to her like a sob.

It was not war, although the flag, the bugle, the men seeking cover, the shot, and the smoke all bore an odd resemblance to the grim game in which crowns and empires are the stakes. It was a peaceful picture enough; they were blasting into the iron heart of the granite to build up with, not to destroy.

Suddenly the girl pursed her red lips and uttered a low whistle. A burly man, in a blue jersey and sea-boots, was climbing the hill, carrying something in his arms. She slipped into the centre of the road, and the man stopped. There was an ugly scowl on his handsome face.

Before she could speak he turned down the corner of the shawl, revealing the face of the sleeping child he carried in the hollow of his arm. The child gave a drowsy whimper, opened a pair of blue eyes, and laughed up into the dark, troubled face of the man.

The knitting had fallen into the dust, and the color had faded from the girl's cheeks.

"'Tis not often that I pray, Ruth," he said, in a low voice; "but as we ran through the storm last night, I prayed that me and him might not meet. If we meet, lass, I shall kill him! And he's your brother, Madge, and I love you."

She put out her trembling hands. For an instant he raised one of his own, as if to thrust her back. But as he saw the sorrow in her eyes and her tremulous lips he yielded. The next moment she was rocking the child in her arms, and her shoulders were shaking.

Two years before there had been scandal in the village. When the handsome young artist, who had come from London to paint pictures, had driven away in his motor-car, Luke Penridge's pretty sister, Nance, had also disappeared.

Madge Olley's brother, Drake, had nailed "foreign," as they called it, to it at the same time. But Nance Penridge had openly flirted with the artist, and for the busybodies that was enough.

Only one man had dared to breathe the scandal in Luke's hearing. He still spoke with a lisp, for he had gone down like a ninepin on the sanded floor of the parlor of the Lighthouse Inn, and lost six teeth.

"Tell me, Luke," said Madge, with a sob.

"I found Nance in London a month ago," answered Penridge, biting hard on the stem of his empty pipe. "Ill and nigh starvin' she was—ill and dyin'. He'd married her fair; that was the only good thing in him. Then he goes 'foreign,' and stops writin' and sendin' money. 'Twas the mad pride in her wouldn't let her come to me and ask help. She fought it out for the child with her own hands, till her health broke. That a Drake Olley's son and her'n, Madge. Somethin' came to my lips just now, lass, as I couldn't keep back. I love you, Madge—love you pure and strong as ever a man loved a woman. And 'twas for the love I bear you, I prayed God last night to keep me and your brother apart, for if we two meet face to face I'll kill him!"

Without raising her eyes, Madge caught his rough hand, and pressed it for an instant to her burning cheek.

"Come," she said, with a catch in her voice, "let us go and see what is to be done, Luke."

II.

After a fit of hysterics, and many lamentations over the perfidy of her son, Mrs. Olley had taken her grandson to her motherly heart and begged Luke to let her take charge of him.

Luke had not yielded up the child willingly. In his first passion he had determined that the boy should never hold intercourse with Drake Olley or his people. But when Madge pleaded, Luke was compelled to surrender.

As Luke was walking down to the harbor in the driving rain he almost collided with an open umbrella. The village had given of its best young blood to the war; but when the lady who owned the umbrella—a visitor at the rectory—caught sight of the burly young giant, she pounced.

"Are you not ashamed," she asked, "a great bulking, healthy fellow like you, to be lounging about in idleness, when your brothers are fighting and dying! Take that!"

Luke's blue eyes twinkled. He accepted the white feather the lady thrust upon him, and used it as a pipe-cleaner. Luke was facing perils quite as deadly as the perils of the trenches.

Two hours later the green seas were lurching against the bows of the trawler and coming aboard in a frothy smother. Through the flurries of snow and mist Luke could see their partner—a second trawler—half-awash, and astern followed a destroyer, almost deluged.

From time to time, Luke Penridge laid his hand on the wet, straining trawl-rope. There was a rumor that a strange boat had been sighted, and these strange vessels sometimes left gruesome reminders behind them. Again he laid his hand on the rope, and lingered. The signal was passed, and the trampling noise of the engines ceased. Then a grey-brown, glistening object like a gigantic mushroom rolled to the surface—a mine.

A second mine appeared closer to the other trawler, too close to be pleasant. They buoyed their ropes, and scuttled clear. Flashes of flame leaped from the deck of the destroyer, and the mines vanished in a tumult of cloud and fire and smoke and up-flung water, as the guns spat flame into the mist.

It was nerve-shattering work, and it was blind work. Half a fathom too much to port or starboard, and they might strike one of these infernal inventions and be hurled sky-high.

As they searched the danger area again, the day grew darker and colder, and snow squalls were more frequent. Then the siren of a vessel droned through the gloom.

She got her warning gratefully—two short blasts and a long one—the signal that she was standing into danger. The second trawler coughed the warning to her in turn, and the destroyer followed with a shrilling note. Then came a deep and hollow roar.

"By the great Harry," cried Luke Penridge, "she's found one! That's a mine."

She was a small tramp steamer, with a cargo of nitrate, and though they almost blew up their boilers to reach her, they were too late.

They launched their boats, though it was risky work, and pulled about. They found a mongrel dog swimming for its life, and Luke Penridge hauled it aboard.

"Easy!" he cried: "We don't seem to be able to do much good." He put his hand to his mouth: "Any luck, Sammy?"

"Not much, poor beggars!" bawled a voice from the other boat. "Will you take the chap we've picked up? He's dead. You're going in to-night, you know, and we're not."

"Give him to Brayley," cried Luke. "Pull aboard, lads!"

They were making for home when Luke went to look at the body. Then he tore off his sou'wester, and stood like a man stunned.

Heaven had brought them face to face, but Heaven had avenged. For the drowned sailor was Drake Olley.

A torpedo-boat, darkening the very air with smoke and cinders, entered the harbor in front of them. The trawler was hailed before she could reach her moorings, and a Government envelope, addressed to Luke Penridge, was handed over.

III.

Madge had unreigned the key of his cottage from Luke Penridge. After being untenanted for nearly a month, though Luke had done his best, the place sadly needed the magic touch of a woman's hand. Luke expected to be in the harbor about seven.

Madge lighted the lamp, and went home, leaving a bright fire burning and his supper ready. Even in her sorrow for what her brother had done, and her dread of what would happen when the two men met, the girl's heart was singing. It was no light thing to have won the love of a man like Luke Penridge, whose name ranked high with all who knew him for honor and integrity.

The baby had been put to bed, and Madge had taken up her knitting, when the knocker sounded heavily.

"That be Luke, lass," said Mrs. Olley. "He's come to fetch the key."

It was not Luke, but Sidson, one of his mates.

"I've got a note for you, Miss Olley," he said. "You bain't like to see Luke Penridge for long enough. He's so good at this mine business, the Admiralty chaps has fetched him away, and they don't let on where. So he writes this and tells me to give it you. Good-night."

He put a purse and an envelope in Madge's hand.

Madge gasped, and turned white as she read:—

"Dearest,—Jim Sidson will tell you I'm going away. The money is for the child. I don't know how to tell you, but it must be told. Me and your brother Drake met to-day out there at sea. There was a Hun steamer mined—A Chilian I think she was—and we picked up your brother's body. All the badness and revenge has gone out of my heart now. I can only have good in it. For I keep thinking of you. I love you, Madge.—Luke."

So Luke was spirited away in the wind and snow on his perilous mission, and Drake Olley was laid to rest in the village churchyard.

Stories of fighting and glory came from the battlefield, tales of gallantry and pluck reached the village from the fleet. But of the fearless men who laid the deadly mines, and groped in the depths of the sea for those laid by the enemy, with grisly death standing for ever at their elbow there was no word.

But Luke Penridge came at last, with one finger, that had been frostbitten, missing. The sun was shining that morning, and he turned into the little barber's shop on the quay for a shave and a trim-up.

Luke smiled as he saw the smoke rising from the chimney of his cottage. No one knew that he was coming, but the smoke proved that he had not been forgotten.

Seeking out the humble cottage which was Madge's home, he paused at the door a moment. He heard uncouth music, strange gurglings, and girlish laughter.

Very cautiously he turned the handle, and looked in. Madge, her hair all tumbled, was kneeling on the rug, holding a toy drum, which the baby was beating joyously with its chubby fists.

The next instant Madge was almost lost to view in the embrace of Luke's great arms.—London Answers.

WONDERFUL MEMORIES.

Some of the Most Extraordinary Instances.

Many librarians have memories that enable them to carry in their heads long lists of titles of books, of the names of the authors, and even of the numbers of the books, to say nothing of their places on the shelves. Long practice, of course, has given them this accomplishment. In some cases it amounts to downright genius.

One of the most extraordinary instances of that ability is to be found in the case of Antonio Magliabechi, librarian of the Grand Duke Cosimo III of Florence. It is said that if a priest wished to compose a panegyric on a saint, and came to Magliabecchi, the librarian would tell him all the references to the saint in literature, even to the parts of the different works where in they were to be found. He could often quote as many as a hundred writers.

Magliabecchi could tell not only who had treated a subject fully, but also who had touched on it incidentally in writing upon other subjects.

It is related that when Magliabecchi visited other libraries, his memory was so remarkable that he needed to see and consult a book only once in its place to fix everything about it permanently in his mind.

One day the grand duke sent for the librarian to ask whether he could get for him a book that was decidedly rare.

"I am sorry, your grace," replied Magliabecchi, "but there is only one copy in the world. That is in the library of the grand seignior at Constantinople. It is the seventh book on the second shelf on the right as you enter."

It is said that Macaulay, who had one of the most remarkable memories of which we have any information, was once caught tripping with reference to a line in "Paradise Lost." In a few days he appeared with the poem in his hand, and, offering it to the gentleman who had "caught him," said "I do not think that you will catch me again on this." And they did not.

An extraordinary memory was that of Dr. Addison Alexander, of Princeton Theological Seminary. His memory was not only tenacious of facts, but of mere words. For the amusement of young people he would sometimes say, "Now I am going to talk without thinking." He would then pour forth period after period of strange words and incongruous images, harmonious and even rhythmical in sound, but wholly destitute of sense. If that seems an easy trick, try to suspend your reason and give free rein to your fancy in periods that shall be grammatically correct and yet without meaning.

It's a poor foot rule that won't measure both ways.

To clean lace yokes and sleeves.—Rub pulverized laundry starch into lace yokes and sleeves and moisten with water. Let stand a few hours and shake the starch out.

To clean enamel.—Enamel bathtubs and sinks may be cleaned like magic with a flannel wet with kerosene.

Even this is problematical. It is doubtful if sun power ever can be generated as cheaply as water power, in certain favored regions, and it will be many a long year before the new development cut down the consumption of coal.

An Irish girl called at Mrs. Green's to get the place as cook. "Are you a plain cook?" inquired Mrs. Green. "Well, mum," replied the girl, "yez may t'ink so, but Officer Mulligan war afther tellin' me thot me eyes wor loike the Lakes av Killarney."

Germany's Shortage of Copper—A Graphic Illustration.

Owing to the shortage of copper in Germany the school teachers have been instructed to tell their scholars to bring all the copper articles they have at home to school. The picture shows the result of one day's collection.

Hints for the Home

Tested Recipes.

Crumb Cake.—Put three cupfuls of sifted flour into a mixing bowl, one and one-half cupfuls of dark brown sugar and four or five teaspoonfuls of cocoa or chocolate. Stir all together, then add one-half cupful of butter and rub ingredients together as for pie crust. Add one cupful of sour milk, one teaspoonful of soda and a pinch of salt; beat all together. Pour batter into a greased pan and bake in a slow oven for two hours.

Sausage Rolls.—Make a rich biscuit dough, roll thin and cut with a large cookie cutter. Have fried link sausage piping hot; roll one link in each disc of dough, pinch the ends together and bake. Serve on a hot platter with brown gravy.

Coffee Cake.—Three cupfuls of flour, one coffee cupful of granulated sugar, three-fourths of a cupful of butter, one heaping teaspoonful of baking powder, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one cupful of currants, two teaspoonfuls of flavoring; roll about one inch in thickness and bake in moderately hot oven.

Ginger Cookies.—One half cupful of molasses, two cupfuls of flour, one-fourth cupful of butter, one tablespoonful of ginger, one-half teaspoonful of cinnamon, one half teaspoonful of salt, one teaspoonful of baking soda. Roll out on a board, cut and bake.

Cream Spice Cake.—One cupful of sour cream (not too thick), one cupful of brown sugar, one teaspoonful of soda; one teaspoonful of baking powder, a pinch of salt, one-fourth teaspoonful each of ginger, allspice and cloves; one-half teaspoonful of cinnamon. Stir with flour enough to make quite thick and bake in a moderately hot oven.

Tansy Cakes.—One quart of white flour, one quart of sour milk, two teaspoonfuls of soda, one teaspoonful of salt, one tablespoonful of minced tansy. Place all in mixing bowl and stir until smooth. Bake on hot griddle.

Butterless, Eggless, Milkless Cake.—One cupful of brown sugar, one cupful of water, two cupfuls of seeded raisins, one-third cupful of lard, one-fourth grated nutmeg, two teaspoonfuls of cinnamon, one teaspoonful of ground cloves and a pinch of salt. Boil together three minutes, when cold add one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in a little hot water. Add one and three-fourths cupfuls of flour in which one-half teaspoonful of baking powder has been sifted. Bake in a loaf in a moderate oven for thirty minutes.

Bread Sponge Cake.—Two cupfuls of light brown sugar, one cupful of lard, three cupfuls of light bread sponge, two cupfuls of seeded raisins, two cupfuls of flour, one tablespoonful each of cloves, allspice and cinnamon. Add one tablespoonful of soda dissolved in one-half cupful of cold coffee. Mix ingredients and let rise for one-half hour. Bake one hour in a slow oven. This will make one large loaf or two smaller ones.

Economical Cookies.—One cupful of brown sugar, one cupful of shortening, one cupful of molasses, one-half cupful of boiling water, one-half teaspoonful of salt, two teaspoonfuls each of baking soda and ginger, one quart of flour or enough to make dough thick enough to roll. Roll one half inch thick. Bake in a quick oven.

White Cookies.—Two cupfuls of white sugar, one cupful of sour milk (or buttermilk), one cupful of lard or butter, a pinch of salt, one teaspoonful of soda, one teaspoonful of nutmeg. Dissolve soda in milk and mix soft with flour. Add to other ingredients, roll out dough and bake in a quick oven.

Ginger Cards.—Two-thirds of a cupful each of butter, sugar, and sour milk, three teaspoonfuls of soda, one teaspoonful of ginger, one large cupful of molasses and flour to roll. Roll thin, sprinkle with white sugar, bake in moderate oven.

Cocoanut and Ginger Pudding.—Crumble one pound of stale sponge cake with one-half pound of grated cocoanut. Pour over this one pint of sweetened milk that has been brought to a boil. Cover the dish and when the milk is soaked up, stir in four well-beaten eggs. Butter a pudding mold, and arrange four ounces of preserved ginger around the sides. Pour in the pudding and steam for one and one half hours. Serve with the syrup drained from the ginger; it should be warmed and poured over the pudding just before serving.

Broiled Kidneys.—Cut kidneys into thick slices. Melt a little butter and stir into it a saltspoonful of mustard and a dash of lemon juice. Dip each slice of kidney in this, roll in cracker dust and set aside until coating stiffens—half an hour will be long enough. Broil on a small gridiron over a clear fire, turning often that the kidneys will not burn. Cook thoroughly and serve very hot.

Southern Corn Pone.—Two cupfuls of corn meal sifted with one teaspoonful of salt and one-fourth teaspoonful of soda; add one heaping tablespoonful of lard, pour one cupful of boiling water over it and mix well; then add three-fourths cupful of sour milk. Have ready a hot baker, well greased, make out the three pones, and place them on the baker, greasing the top of each with lard; let bake until a light brown, and serve with vegetables.

Scalloped Salmon.—With a fork, break the flesh of a pound can of red salmon and mix in salt and pepper. Spread in a shallow baking pan with alternate layers of cracker crumbs. Moisten with the salmon oil and hot water, and bake half an hour.

Useful Hints.

To remove gasoline ring.—It often happens that a ring remains around a spot which has been cleaned with gasoline. To prevent this, place a piece of blotting paper under the spot while cleaning it.

To clean an old straw hat.—Dissolve a few grains of oxalic acid in half a cup of warm water. Then sponge the hat well with this. This not only cleans, but will bleach a very yellow hat real white.

To shrink wash goods.—Put the goods into a pan, cover with boiling water and let stand until cool enough to handle.

To remove chocolate stains.—If cocoa or chocolate has been spilled on tablecloths or napkins, sprinkle borax on the stains, wash in cold water and they will entirely disappear.

For fried fish.—When frying fish, dip them in milk instead of egg before rolling them in bread crumbs; this is more economical and the fish will taste better, too.

Treatment for a corn.—A corn or bunion may be reduced by rubbing briskly each night with sandpaper. This does not cause the soreness that paring does, and in time the calloused part will be entirely absorbed.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL STUDY

INTERNATIONAL LESSON, APRIL 18.

Lesson III.—The Shepherd Psalm.

Psa. 23. Golden Text: Psa. 23. 1.

I.—The Good Shepherd.

(Verses 1 to 4).

Verse 1. Jehovah is my shepherd—To regard a ruler as a shepherd in a pastoral country was natural. Jehovah is frequently spoken of as the Shepherd of Israel, and Israel as his flock. Jacob speaks of the "God who shepherded me" (Gen. 48. 15; see also Gen. 49. 24). David himself as king was called the shepherd (see 2 Sam. 5. 2; 7. 7). The future king, of whom David was a type, was called a shepherd (Mic. 5. 4; Ezek. 34. 23). The use of Shepherd applied to Jehovah is frequent in the Psalms (74. 1; 77. 20; 78. 52; 79. 13; 80. 1; etc.). The emphasis on the personal pronoun my is striking.

I shall not want—Future assurance based on past experience. Looking back on the journey through the wilderness, Israel saw that she "lacked nothing" (Deut. 2. 7). Hence she could look forward to the Land of Promise and say, "Thou shalt not lack anything in it" (Deut. 8. 9).

2. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures—In pastures of tender grass. This suggests the shade and coolness and rest during the noontime heat.

He leadeth me—In the Orient the shepherd never drives, but always leads his sheep. Such was God's guidance of his people (Exod. 13. 13; Psa. 31. 3; Isa. 40. 10).

The still waters — In Hebrew "waters of rest," where refreshment as well as actual rest was found.

3. He restoreth my soul—Food and drink and rest precede the restoration of soul. The Good Shepherd renews and sustains life.

He guideth me . . . for his name's sake—He could not be untrue to himself. Hence he must guide into paths of righteousness (see Exod. 34. 5-7). He "has regard to his revealed character in shepherding his lamb and will give direction hereunto he is what he is, and in order that he may be known to be what he has declared himself."

4. Valley of the shadow of death—The pastures of Palestine were not open fields or meadows, but narrow valleys and defiles where all sorts of danger lurked. Wild beasts were about, and deep ravines invited the dangerous falls. Yet in such a valley there was no danger. It was necessary to go through these valleys to find food. The phrase "shadow of death" means "deep gloom."

Thy rod and thy staff—The shepherd's crook was at once a "rod," or club, with which to defend his sheep from attack and a "staff" on which to lean.

II.—The Bountiful Host.

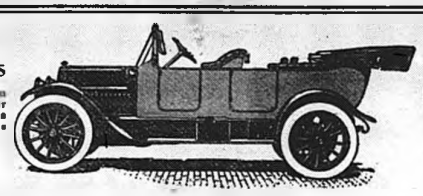
(Verses 5 and 6).

5. In the presence of mine enemies—Or, adversaries. Life is not only short, it is full of conflict. To prepare a feast of good things in a short life full of conflict is even more indicative of a Father's care than to lead into green pastures and beside still waters.

Thou hast anointed my head—"And, therefore, I know that thou wilt again anoint me." This does not refer to the anointing of a king as Saul and David were anointed by Samuel. The reference here is to the perfumes and unguents used at an Oriental banquet (see Psa. 45. 7; 92. 10; Amos 6. 6).

My cup runneth over—In Psa. 16. 5, "cup" is used as if food were meant. Whatever the "cup" was or whatever it contained, the idea is of Jehovah's bountifulness. He was no niggardly host. What he gave was in abundance far beyond what his children could ask or think.

6. Surely—There could be no question that goodness and mercy, or "lovingkindness," should follow one who followed such a leader. The word for "follow" literally means "to pursue." There was no escaping the "goodness and lovingkindness." They would overtake the "follower" of Jehovah in spite of anything the "follower" might do.



And I shall dwell in the house of Jehovah forever—The Hebrew has the expressive phrase "for length of days." A perfected kingdom is coming in which we shall not be disturbed either by heat or drought or famine or enmity. There will not only be refreshment and rest on the march; there will be a continual abiding in the Father's house.

Mr. Manley—Well, my dear, I've had my life insured for $5,000. Mrs. Manley—How very sensible of you. Now I shan't have to keep telling you to be so careful every place you go.

"Are you the defendant?" asked the Judge. "No, boss," replied the man. "I ain't done nothin' to be called names like dat. I'se got a lawyer here." "Then who are you?" "Why, I'se the gen'leman 'at took de chickens."

CANTIRE

(Intended for last week)

"Another of the old folk from Argyle" was the remark passed by an old resident on hearing of the death of Mr Neil Stewart, which sad event took place at his late home in Chesley on Friday, March 26th. It is true that the folk from Argyle, who filled a large place in the early history of this community, have had their ranks thinned by the Great Reaper till now, from one end of the line to the other, their numbers can be counted on the fingers of one hand. The death of this old pioneer, who was 82 years of age, was due to pneumonia. He was a native of the historic shire above referred to, coming to this country when a youth, settling in the Tp of Darlington. Here he was married to Mrs Isabella Galbraith, sister of Mr H Mitchell, 8th con, and together they came to Elderslie about the year 1856, settling on lot 26, con 4, afterwards purchasing lots 19, cons 4 and 5. Here a sturdy family of eight grew up to manhood and womanhood and left the old roof tree to make homes for them elves. About six years ago the home was broken up by the death of Mrs Stewart. About four years ago Mr Stewart sold his farm and moved to Chesley where he was married three years ago to a Mrs Henry who still survives him. The subject of this sketch was a man of more than ordinary intelligence and was well posted on public questions but he never sought municipal honors. He was essentially a son of the soil and was always found in the vanguard of progress. His farm was one of the best tilled in the township. He was as quick to adopt or imitate new methods as he was to discard old ones. He was a first-class plowman and was never beaten at a match, and whether holding the plough or helping others he was always an enthusiast. He was one of the pioneers in Elderslie in the importing and breeding of thoroughbred Shorthorn cattle and Clydesdale horses. In these lines he was an artist, was well informed on all the fancy points of breeding and filled the important position of judge at many a fall fair. Mr Stewart was one of the first in the township to own a self binder, erect a silo, sink an artesian well, etc, which showed he possessed that undaunted spirit which never accepts defeat. In fruit culture he took a deep interest and had one of the largest orchards in the settlement. The deceased was not only well-read but he had travelled a great deal. He made several trips across the Atlantic and had visited to the coast and prairies more than once. He was a good neighbor and in the early days when the veterinary could not be summoned by the telephone, as is our days, his services were often sought and just as readily given. His knowledge of the handling of stock and their diseases was often the means of saving the life of a horse or cow which meant a great deal to the settler in those early days. In politics Mr Stewart was a Liberal and an ardent party worker. In religion he was a Presbyterian and the services at the grave were conducted by his pastor, Rev Mr Hilts, of Geneva Church, Chesley. To the sorrowing wife and family we extend the sympathy of the community. The family are: Mrs Reed, of Portland, Ore; Mrs D N McIntyre, of Meadows, Man; Dr Annie, of Syracuse, N Y; Mrs Burroughs, Kamloops, B C; Alex, of Winnipeg; John, of North Bay; Andrew, of Victoria. Mr John Stewart, Elora road south, is a brother.

Miss Kate McDermid is home from London.

GRESHAM

The annual meeting of the W M Society met in the church here on the 8th inst. All the officers were elected. Last year about $66 was raised and a valuable box of clothing was sent to the Indians in the west. An interesting feature of the meeting was the presentation of a life membership certificate to Miss Edith M Rose given to her by Mrs Wm Rose through the auxiliary. Mrs Wm Foster, treasurer for the society, read the following address:

Dear Edith — It affords us very much pleasure to-day to acquaint you with the fact that you are now a life member of the W M Society through the great kindness of your foster mother, Mrs Wm Rose, who has paid the amount necessary to our treasurer, requesting that you should become a life member through our auxiliary. We rejoice with you in the possession of this gift from one who has done so much for us as a society and for you since you came under her care as a child of five years. Since you joined this society you have been a credit to us all. You were our valued treasurer for three years, also our organist, and did all in your power for the success of the society. We are justly proud of our young member and pray that this gift will be a great blessing to you and the means of drawing you closer to the great Master whose we are and whom we serve.

WALKERTON

The well-drillers at the pumping station struck a flowing well on Tuesday night when down about 230 feet, and it seems that Walkerton will now have an unlimited supply of splendid water which is worth many thousand of dollars to the town. This is the luckiest strike that the corporation has made in years, as the water is gushing up and overflowing the land like a flood, and the need of expending huge sums of money in pumping the water to fill the reservoir recurs at an end.

John Brough, a Brant farmer residing near Elmwood, sued Charles Emke, a sawmiller of Bentinck, at the non-jury sittings before Judge Klein in Walkerton on Tuesday for $300 damages for removing a barn off Brough's farm while he was absent in the west. Emke claimed, however, that he had bought the barn from Emerson Henderson, a dentist of Chesley, who it seems had represented himself as Brough's agent. After the evidence was adduced judgment was given by the court in favor of Brough for $250 and costs against Emke. Judgment was also given Emke for $135 against Henderson and costs occasioned by him being added to the suit as a third party.

While Quartermaster Martyn of the 34th Battalion was issuing some military supplies to the soldiers of the third contingent at the training camp at Guelph last week, he noticed a face in the lines that he thought was familiar to him, and on questioning the man found that he was none other than Arthur Channing, who left Walkerton about eighteen months ago in search of work and whose wife has since been advertising for him. The distracted woman, who was left with her family in an almost destitute state here, received word that he had been seen by friends in England, but on enquiring from Channing it was found that he had not crossed the ocean at all since his departure from here, but had confined his roamings to Canada and the United States. As he formerly worked under Capt Martyn at the bobbin factory here, the latter persuaded him to visit Walkerton over Easter and the re-union of Channing and his family after their long separation was probably the happiest holiday event pulled off in Walkerton this season. As a result of her husband being in the ranks, the woman will receive from the government the grant allowed to soldier's wives, as well as being privileged to participate in the patriotic relief funds, so Channing's discovery will be almost as great a financial boon as a domestic felicity to her.

Although the Brant township council have pulled off some odd stunts since assuming office this year, yet the slight of some of the rural statesmen refusing to accept the township's cheques in payment for their services at the council meeting on Monday last was the climax in a municipal comedy that is enough to make the end man in a minstrel show fear that they have nothing on Brant in the joke game. The great scare Walkerton didn't like to lose the exchange by accepting Elmwood bank cheques, and consequently we have the township treasurer trying to hand them their pay and they refusing it with all the modesty of a Cæsar refusing the crown. When the inmates of the asylums read this they will just go crazy over it, and even some others may think it funny that Brant council are asking people in Walkerton and vicinity to take their cheques, when as a matter of fact they won't accept their own. Just how the farce would have ended is unknown had a number of the board from near Elmwood not rushed to the rescue and saved the situation by cashing the cheques of his colleagues at par. As the same trouble is likely to develop at each meeting the man from Elmwood will have to bring a wad with him each time to keep the municipal show from again mutinying until such time as arrangements can be made to cash Brant cheques in the Walkerton banks at par. Numerous cheques, which are being issued to parties in town and vicinity for payment of township debts are also being refused, and it is certain that Brant will have to come across with the cold coin or else add the exchange on the cheques of the creditors who want to get them cashed here. While we expected trouble from the outside, yet to find certain of the councillors kicking at the cheques themselves is certainly a great tribute to the statesmanship that remove t the funds from the Walkerton bank.—Herald and Times.

SIXTH CON. BRUCE

Quite a number on this line have been laid up with lagrippe but are improving nicely.

The outcome of the conference is that there will be no early closing regulation, except that a majority of business places will take a half holiday on Thursday afternoon and evening during the months of May, June, July and August.

—Mrs. Wm. Green, one of the earliest settlers on the Elora road south of Paisley, passed away at Courtenay, N.D., on April 5th, at the age of 80 years. Deceased left Cargill 22 years ago for Nipissing district where he conducted a successful lumbering industry at Warren for 18 years. Retiring from business four years ago he moved to Davidson, Sask. During the last year he complained of not feeling well and in October he, with Mrs. Keeling, came east in the hope that a change of climate would prove beneficial. Mr Keeling was an active member of the Presbyterian church, was choir leader every place in which he resided and for the past twenty years was S S superintendent. He leaves to mourn his loss besides his wife, one son, C. Lewis, of Elbow, Sask., and one daughter, Mrs Wm. Barrie (Bessie), of Davidson, Sask., also two brothers, C. W., of Cargill, and J. M., of Barrie. The remains were taken to Davidson for interment.

—The Boston marathon race on Monday was again won by a Canadian, Edouard Fabre of Montreal.

—One of the most pleasant places in Paisley to spend a quiet hour is the Public Library. Its shelves contain 5000 of the best books that could be procured, and another lot of the latest are being placed on the shelves this week. The volumes cover such a wide range of subjects that the taste of any reader can be thoroughly satisfied. The room is open every Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday afternoons from 4 to 5 30, and every evening from 7 30 to 9 or 9 30. The tables are strewn with the principal daily papers, some local weeklies, also the best magazines and periodicals, both illustrative and otherwise. Miss McCallum, the librarian, is an exceedingly courteous official, and is always ready to give any information possible to the reading patrons. Outside of our citizens, people from the surrounding country who feel time hanging heavily on their minds while in town will find the Paisley Public Library an ideal spot to rest and enjoy themselves. Rural residents are also invited to become members and take advantage of all the privileges of reading room and library.

—At a meeting held in Dr. Allen's office on Monday evening, the Paisley Lacrosse Club was re organized for the 1915 season. After short addresses by several business men of the town and players, the following officers were elected: President, J. R. Laidlaw; vice-president, A. Archer; sec'y-treas., Fred Blue; manager, J. S. Dewar; captain, W. J. Ellis; coach, Dr. A. H. Allen; executive committee, T. Ellis, J. Forrester, L. Rankin and Guy Purdy, along with the officers. It was decided to enter the intermediate series of the O. A. L. A., if suitable grouping could be made with the towns along this line of railway. W. J. Ellis offered to provide sweaters for the team, should the grouping turn out satisfactorily. Prospects are bright for a good team, as all of last year's players and one or two others will likely be in line. The matter of holding a celebration on May 24th or June 3rd was not definitely decided upon.

—The Paisley Creamery opened this week, the cream wagons making the first trips of the season on Monday. This is one of the institutions that does a good deal to promote the "patriotism and production" movement. Without it the farmers could not keep so many cows in these days of labor scarcity. Fewer cows would mean less fertiliser for the land, which in turn would mean smaller crops and poor returns. There is a larger number of cows in the Paisley district this year than of late years, and if other conditions are favorable this creamery will likely have a large output for the season.

Hints for the Home

Selected Recipes.

Eggs with Tomatoes.—Chop one-half of a pound of fat mutton, and fry it rare with butter. Add one pound of tomatoes that have been peeled and cut up. Season the mixture with salt and pepper. When the meat and tomatoes are almost done, add three eggs, and cook the whole a little longer.

Sand Tarts (Peasant).—Rub one heaping cupful of butter into four cupfuls of flour and two cupfuls of sugar. Moisten the mass with two eggs well beaten. Roll it thin on a tin sheet, and brush it over with egg. Sprinkle it with sugar, cinnamon, and pounded peanuts. Cut it into squares, and bake them until they are brown.

Puree of Dried Peas with Sausages.—Put the peas into cold water the night before. In the morning put them into a pot with one-half of a pint of tepid water, and season them with salt, pepper and thyme. Add an onion and a little bacon; or if the bacon is not at hand, use butter. Cook the mixture slowly one-half of an hour, crush it, strain it, and serve it with small fried sausages.

An Army Stew.—Scald one red pepper and remove the seeds. Then chop the pepper, one small onion, and a clove of garlic together fine, and mix them in a pan with one tablespoonful of butter. Add three tablespoonfuls of tomato catchup, one tablespoonful of Worcestershire sauce, and one and one-half tablespoonfuls of water. Make this mixture into a thick gravy, add cut-up cold meat, and heat thoroughly.

Soft Cakes.—Rub one-half of a pound of butter and one-quarter of a pound of sugar into a pound of flour into which two teaspoonfuls of baking powder have been well sifted. Add one teaspoonful each of ground nutmeg and cinnamon, and currants or raisins. Stir in a very little milk, and enough preserve juice of any desired flavor to make a batter that will just pour. Bake the cakes in small, shallow pans in a hot oven.

Scallop Chowder.—Use one quart of scallops parboiled twenty minutes in boiling water. Take three slices of salt pork and two onions cut up very fine, and fry them to a delicate brown. Pare six good-sized potatoes, and slice them thin. Put the pork, the onions, and the potatoes into three pints of milk, cook them until the potatoes are soft, add two tablespoonfuls of butter; salt and pepper to taste, add the scallops (which if large should be cut into small pieces). When they are cooked remove the dish from the fire, pour the chowder into a tureen, and put browned butter crackers on top. This recipe will make about three quarts of chowder.

A Palestine Soup.—Take three dozen fresh artichokes, peel them, and put them at once into cold water. After they have stood a few minutes place them in a stewpan with four onions, the outer sticks of a head of celery, and three pints of white stock. Let the whole simmer gently for an hour. Remove the onions and strain the artichokes and the liquor through a sieve; put the puree back into the stewpan, and when it is hot, stir in a pint of hot cream, or, if you prefer, a mixture of cream and milk. Season the soup with white pepper, salt, and a little nutmeg. Let it simmer for a minute or two, and serve it. Send it to the table with fried bread cut into small dice. The quantity is sufficient for six persons.

The Northern Gibraltar.

It is only a quarter of a century, writes a contributor to the Field, since Heligoland was an English possession. A British force seized the barren rock in 1807, during hostilities with Denmark, which used to own it; and such was its strategical importance that England insisted on keeping it at the end of the war.

Heligoland is opposite the mouths of the Elbe and Weser rivers, and is twenty-eight miles from the nearest point on the mainland. There are really two islands, and they are important because they command the approaches to Hamburg and Bremen, and the entrance to the Kiel Canal.

The main island is a huge rock about a mile in length by some five hundred yards wide, with steep red cliffs that rise two hundred feet above sea level. A channel a quarter of a mile wide separates the main rock from a little islet called Sand Islet or Dunen-Insel. The landing place is at the south-east corner of the island, where a sandy spit called the Unterland is connected with the top of the cliffs, or Oberland, by a long flight of steps and an elevator. There is a residential population of nearly four thousand, and during the summer months forty thousand holiday makers visit Heligoland for the bathing from the "dune."

The German occupation dates from 1890. In that year the British and German governments made an agreement by which Germany engaged to recognize a protectorate of Great Britain over the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba, and the dominions of the Sultan of Witu and the adjacent territory up to Kismayu; and Great Britain engaged to cede Heligoland to Germany. The islands were fortified in the days of the British occupation, but the Germans have greatly strengthened the works since they got possession of them. They have replaced the British batteries by armed turrets mounting guns of heavy caliber, and they have spent large sums on the harbor works. Heligoland is one of the strongest strategic defences of the short but marvelously protected German coast on the North Sea.

The sea, however, is steadily wearing Heligoland away. In 800 A.D. it was 120 miles in circumference. By 1300 it had decreased to a circumference of forty-five miles, and by 1649 it covered only four square miles. At present it is scarcely one-third of one square mile in area.

The Dahlia.

Now is the time to tend to our dahlias. If you already have the tubers, bring them out of the sand in which you stored them, put them in a light, warm place and water them.

In a surprisingly short time there will be dozens of sprouts. There are two ways of planting the sprouts, and both have the staunchest supporters.

One is to cut a sprout about four inches long just below a leaf joint at an acute angle, stick the cutting, or sprout, into sharp sand, keep well watered until it is rooted and then plant in a pot of rich earth, and never let it get too dry.

The other is to cut a piece of the tuber, allowing it to have only one sprout, and plant it in a pot of half rich earth, half sand.

While the second method is a little the easier, better success may perhaps be had with the first method.

Keep the pots in a sunny window, or, better still, in a cool frame. When the weather is warm and settled, usually from the 15th to the 20th of May, plant your dahlias where they are to grow, setting them deep in the ground. Drive a stout five-foot stake beside each plant. Break off any side shoots that appear until the plant is about eighteen inches tall, then let it branch as it will.

Tie it firmly to the stake, cultivate it frequently—that is, stir the soil around the roots of the plant, water during the dry season—and you will be rewarded with a wealth of bloom.

Nothing in literature is more fascinating than a seed catalogue, and the descriptions of the different varieties of dahlias is like seeing some oriental pageant all glorious with color.

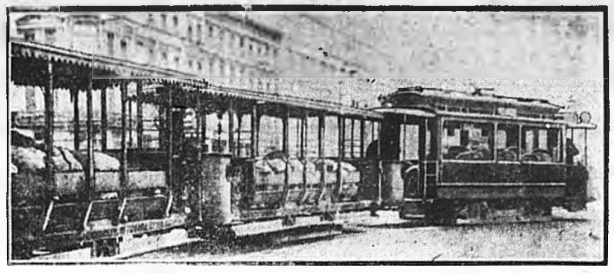
Do buy a few dahlias this year, even though you have many, for each year they grow more beautiful, and if you follow one of the above methods your dahlias will be really as beautiful as the catalogue descriptions.

The Royal Fusiliers.

No regiment in the British army was more favored with recruits on the outbreak of the war than the Royal Fusiliers. The regiment has an honorable history. It was raised in London in 1685 by command of King James II. to guard the ordnance of the army, and its members being armed with a firearm known as the fusil, the title of Fusiliers arose. In those days the Fusiliers coats were of scarlet, faced with yellow, the breeches gray and the cap tall and of yellow cloth.

In its early days the regiment underwent many changes. Three years after its formation it ceased to perform its special duties in connection with artillery and was ranked among the infantry regiments of the crown. Later the Fusiliers served as marines, and as such fought in the battle with the Spanish fleet of Messina in 1718.

The peninsular war provided the Fusiliers with an opportunity to prove their merit. The names of every important battle during that campaign figure on the colors of the regiment. It was the individual gallantry of the Fusiliers at Albuera which won a victory for the English, although the Britishers suffered terrible losses. The second battalion of the regiment had to be sent home to England to recruit its thinned ranks, but the first battalion remained with Wellington and added to the laurels of the Fusiliers at the victorious battles of Salamanca and Vittoria.



The words "Alma," "Inkermann" and "Sevastopol" on the colors of the Fusiliers tell of the heroic part the regiment played in the Crimea. In Afghanistan the Fusiliers were part of the force shut up in Kabul, and were relieved by the late Lord Roberts.

Transporting Pota toes Through Streets of Berlin in Government Trams.

Since the Government has taken hold of the food supply of Germany, there has been a remarkable economy in provisions and foods in general. Not a particle of food is allowed to go to waste. By this means Germany hopes to be able to combat England's fatal blockade. The picture shows three street cars filled with bags of potatoes on the way to a municipal food depot in Berlin.

While the Whistle Blew.

At ten o'clock on a black night in January Rufe Clemens sculled his little punt out toward the dim, yellow riding light that showed on the Glencoe. The dredge lay in the middle of Heron harbor, right over Sculpin Rock, or at least what was left of it.

Rufe was the engineer on the Glencoe, and was the only man who bunked aboard. That night he had taken supper ashore with his cousin, Jerry Sprague, who had urged him to stay until morning.

"Much obliged, Jerry," he said, "but I must be getting aboard the dredge. I've got to have steam up extra early to-morrow morning."

It was a rough trip out, and Rufe felt relieved when he at last got aboard her.

Fifty feet to leeward another square-stemmed craft, with a two-story deck house, rose and fell on the seas. It was the drill boat, Valley Forge, all black except for her one blurred riding light. Her crew had gone to bed.

Rufe made his punt fast, and hastened to get into his snug bunk in the firecoom. Before many minutes had passed, he had dropped into a sound sleep.

Some time in the night he dreamed he was in an earthquake on the coast of Peru. Pretty soon the quakings began to seem so real that Rufe awoke. The first thing he became aware of was a loud, continuous whistling—Whoo-o-o-o-o!

Bump! What was that? The whole dredge shivered; every bone in Rufe's body felt the tremor. He started up, and now fully awake, realized that the screeching whistle was close aboard.

Rufe threw off his blankets and sprang from his bunk. Without waiting to strike a light, he pulled on his trousers. Bump! It took him a moment to find his shoes. Once again—bump-mp! Rufe was bending over, pulling on his second shoe, and the shock sent him sprawling. He could afford to spend no more time in dressing. Jumping up, he ran out, with his shoestrings hanging loose. He did not have time even to put on his coat.

The Glencoe had drifted up her harbor, and was bumping the Valley Forge.

The Glencoe, held only by her bowlines, had swung round so that every sea sent her smashing into the Valley Forge. One thing puzzled him, however: not a man was in sight on the drill boat. Where was her crew? Why had they not put out fenders to stop the boats from smashing each other to pieces? And why was the whistle screeching so persistently?

Anyway, some one ought to do something. Rufe watched his chance, and a second before the boats crashed together on a high sea, he leaped aboard the Valley Forge and darted into the boiler room.

No one was there. From a hook in the ceiling not far above the water gauge swung a lighted lantern. On the dangling end of the whistle cord, which ran from the smokestack through several pulleys, was tied a brick. That explained the incessant screeching; the brick was holding the valve open.

Bump! A slight motion along the left wall caught Rufe's eye.

Between two uprights of studding were piled four or five hundred fire brick.

Rufe noticed that the pile, which was several feet wide and higher than his head, no longer stood plumb. One or two bumps more would send them tumbling.

Again the dredge crashed into the Valley Forge. The pile of bricks swayed forward, and at the same time something rolled on the floor at its foot.

He glanced down, and a sudden, paralyzing horror swept over him. Right under the bricks lay what looked like two big candles, twenty-four inches long, wrapped in oiled paper. Rufe knew that they were sticks of dynamite.

If the bricks came down on those sticks, the impact would explode the dynamite with shattering force. Stored in the after hold, only a few feet away, were two tons of dynamite, and that would explode, too. The drill boat would be blown to fragments.

Rufe took two leaps across the room, as the dredge and the drill boat crashed together, the wall of bricks bowed toward him. He flung himself desperately forward, with arms outstretched, and jamming his whole body hard against the tottering pile, crowded it back with his hands, his shoulders, and his chest. The bricks resisted. He could hold them where they were—for a time; but he could not push them back into place.

The boat heaved. One of the deadly cylinders rolled against the engineer's foot. He looked down, and saw that there were three sticks now. He did not know what to do. If he took his hands from the wall for a single second the bricks might tumble. Would he have time to pick up the sticks and get away safely? He decided that the risk was too great.

Where had that third stick come from? He twisted his head round. Across the floor an open dynamite box lay on its side, and behind it was another box. It was customary to keep two or three cases of dynamite in the boiler room, so that the explosive might be warm enough to use in cold weather. Rufe saw what had happened. The upper box had been opened, and its outer lapid loosely back upon it. Jarred forward by successive bumps, it had tipped off and spilled its contents. Even as Rufe looked, another stick rolled out. That made four of the deadly sticks rolling loose at his feet.

Then came two crashes; the first was made by the Glencoe's bumping the drill boat, but the second was caused by something else. Could the drill boat be pounding on the bottom? Impossible! Then he remembered her "spuds."

The spuds, two forty-foot sticks of hard pine, twelve inches square, with heavy iron caps on their ends, ran up and down through wells in the boat. When dropped on the bottom, like a pair of huge stilts, they held the boat immovable in one spot, so that the drills could work accurately. Evidently, at the close of the day's work, the spuds had been lowered only a little way off the ledge; and now, in the dead low tide and the heavy sea, they were hitting with a terrific jar every time the boat dropped into the trough of the waves.

Rufe understood everything now. When the Glencoe had begun to hurl her lumbering tons against the Valley Forge only a few feet from the dynamite stacked in the hold, the captain and his men had become panic-stricken. They had not seen Rufe return to the dredge, and thought that he was safe ashore. So, after tying the brick to the whistle cord to hold the valve open, in order to alarm the tug, they had abandoned the boat. The sticks of dynamite had no doubt got loose after the men had gone.

A cascade of spray sloshed against the house. The unlatched door slammed open, and a cold blast struck Rufe's neck. As he putted his strength against the toppling bricks, all sorts of schemes for meeting the situation ran through his head; but he dismissed them, one by one, as impossible. He could not dispose of the pile by throwing brick after brick from the top, for he did not dare to take away his hands from their present position.

The spuds were hammering harder, lifting, dropping. It must be the dead slack of the ebb. The shocks from the Glencoe came like the blows of a battering ram. Rufe's teeth chattered. Dynamite was uncertain stuff. It might stand no end of pounding; again, any one of those bumps might be the last.

The wall of bricks still pushed steadily against him. While he held it back in one place, it pressed forward in another. He could feel it surge against his chest, and force him back little by little. Each shock from the Glencoe or the spuds made a slight change in the position of every brick. The wall was hard to hold in place, because it was made up of so many separate units. Rufe braced himself and stiffened his body, but he realized that in spite of him the pile must in the end come down. The best he could hope to do would be to delay its fall until help should arrive. Surely that bellowing whistle must soon bring the Damocles out! If only they could know the need of haste!

Back! Was not another whistle blending with that of the Valley Forge? He strained his ears. Again came the sound, louder, nearer. Yes; here was the Damocles at last. Gritting his teeth, he summoned every ounce of his strength in an effort to hold the bricks back until the men from the tug could reach him.

Quick! Quick! Surely they must be near enough now to hear him. He shouted hoarsely, "Help! Help! Help!"

Too late! The pile would fall before help could come. Its weight was bending him backward. His eyes fell again on the oiled paper balls on the floor. With his feet he tried to push them gently back out of the way; but he could not do it.

Out on the dredge he heard voices. Now he wished that he had let the bricks drop at first; then he would not have made others share his death. He tried to warn them.

"Keep off! Keep off!"

But he could not make them hear. His strength was almost gone. Ten seconds more, perhaps not so many! He looked down again.

For the moment the four sticks of dynamite lay close together in an area small enough to be covered by his body. The next bump might disarrange them. In a flash Rufe saw his chance.

Tearing his hands from the wall, and throwing them up to protect his head, he dropped on his knees and arched his body over the dynamite. Down came the bricks in a rumbling avalanche. Rufe held his breath. The showering bricks bruised and hurt him cruelly. Luckily they did not have far to fall, or they would have knocked him senseless. He lay there, half stunned and pinned down, but thankful that his body had kept them from exploding the dynamite.

The Damocles toward the Glencoe away; and with the rising tide the spuds of the Valley Forge soon stopped pounding on the ledge. Then the crew came back on board, and to their amazement found Rufe in the boiler room. He was too much exhausted at the time to make any explanation; but they did not need any when they lifted him from the wreckage and saw what lay under him.—Youth's Companion.

People of Other Lands.

What a strange and interesting thing nationality is! We see a person in the streets, and say—That man is a Frenchman; I am sure of it: look at the way he gesticulates. As a Frenchman is known by his gesticulations, and an Englishman by his look of amazement with everything that is going on around him, so in some way or another every nationality can be discerned. Very few of us ever pause to think how a nation gets its characteristics. A great deal depends upon the climate and geographical situation of a country. The people of the sunny south are of necessity more light-hearted and pleasure loving than their serious brothers and sisters of the north. In Southern Europe, for instance, men and women need not work hard in order to live—the necessaries of life, bread, vegetables, fruit, are easy to procure, and as to education they don't bother their heads about it—that is to say, the poorer classes. In no country in the world are the people so earnest over their business as in North America; this is because life is harder here, competition is great, the climate has great extremes, the cities are thickly populated; all these things make life serious. One is apt to make fun of another, to accuse it of being unartistic, having no sense of humor, being unpractical, lazy, too ambitious, and so on, but this is really because she does not understand the conditions of the other nation. Would you be ambitious if everything you needed for your daily life was found near at hand and could be procured without effort? On the other hand, it is impossible to imagine intelligent citizens of large cities being unpractical. The war is showing what each nation has and what she lacks. Let us try to learn something of the characters of foreign nations—be they friends or foes.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL STUDY

INTERNATIONAL LESSON, APRIL 25.

Lesson IV. — David and Goliath. I Sam. 17. 1-54. Golden Text, Rom. 8. 31.

Verse 38. And Saul clad David with his apparel—A military dress to which a sword was attached. It would seem that David was almost as large as Saul. Otherwise Saul surely would not have put his armor on the boy. David undoubtedly rattled around in the unusual and unwieldy corselet and helmet. This was due rather to his inexperience than to his size.

39. I cannot go with these; for I have not proved them — David knew nothing about warriors' garments, particularly the equipment of a king. For the moment his boyish pride was quickened as the king put his weapons in his hand. But only for the moment. He knew that he could not fight thus weighted down and handicapped. So he put them off with the respectful excuse to Saul that he had not proved, or tried, such a coat and helmet and sword.

40. Took his staff in his hand—Not to fight with, but because he always carried it with him. Even if he did not lay it aside when he was ready to use his sling, it would be no impediment, but rather a help to him. The weight in one hand would balance the weight in the other.

Five smooth stones out of the brook—He was sure of himself, but he intended to take no chances. He would not risk the battle on one throw or two or three. The brook near the scene of battle was full of smooth and rounded pebbles, the very kind David had used many times, doubtless, in his sling.

His sling—The shepherds of Syria were all used to the sling. Even left handed men were experts. In Judg. 20. 16 we read: "Among all this people there were seven hundred chosen men left-handed; every one could sling stones at a hair's breadth, and not miss."

41. And the man that bare the shield went before him—Goliath was so heavily equipped that he could not carry all his implements of the battle.

42. He disdained him—See Prov. 16. 18; Isa. 37. 23. Pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall."

43. Am I a dog?—The dog even in Palestine is ill esteemed.

44. I will give thy flesh unto the birds of the heavens, and to the beasts of the field—The anger of Goliath seemed to drive him to the use of poetry. Professor Kirkpatrick calls attention to Hector's defiance of Ajax in Homer's "Iliad," 13. 831.

Thy flesh
Shall glut the dogs and carrion birds of Troy.

45. I come to thee in the name of Jehovah of hosts—A childlike faith such as could be the inspiration of the Shepherd Psalm.

46. That there is a God in Israel—A God who is worthy of Israel (see 1 Kings 18. 36).

47. That Jehovah saveth not with sword and spear—This was a conviction of the Israelites (see 1 Sam. 2. 1-10; 14. 6; Psa. 44. 6, 7; Hos. 1. 7; Zech. 4. 6). war is the experience of all who trust God. (See especially 1 Cor. 1. 27, 28).

48. Ran toward the army—That is, toward the battle line of the Philistines. David did not wait for the giant to approach him. The suddenness, as well as the swiftness, of David's movements must have taken Goliath at a great disadvantage.

50. Smote the Philistine and slew him—David must have struck some exposed part of Goliath's head.

51. And when the Philistines saw that their champion was dead, they fled—In verses 4 and 23 the word used is "champion" in our sense; here "champion" means "mighty man." The strongest man of the Philistine's had. As soon as he was dead hope left the Philistines and they fled.

Wire Fencing and Trees.

Occasionally, in running wire fences, it is necessary to attach the wires to trees. In doing this, it is bad practice to use staples to attach the wire directly to the trees, thus ensuring that the wire will become overgrown and imbedded in the wood. Not only is the tree thereby ruined or injured but, further, it is impossible to remove the fencing without cutting either the wire or the tree.

A better way, protecting both the tree and the fence, is first to nail to the tree a strip of wood about four inches wide and one inch thick of a length to suit the height of the fence. The wire fence can then be stapled to this strip and will not interfere with the tree growth.

Not the Same.

Caller—Pardon me, sir, but is there another artist in this building?

Artist—There is not. There is however, a man on the fourth floor who paints.

PEERLESS PERFECTION

applies to our Poultry Fencing just right. It keeps your chickens at home—and their enemies out. Each intersection securely locked—the kind that stays "put."

Peerless Poultry Fence

The Darkest Hour;

Or, The Hope That Still Lived.

"Yes, you love me—you," he murmured feebly. "You are like an angel. But father has publicly disowned me, and privately cursed me. You cannot deny that he, at least, would have preferred that I should not come back, nor otherwise remind him of my existence. And it would only harrow up mother's heart afresh if she should know. That was why I wanted you not to tell her. It is different with you. But I thought that even you must despise me so utterly as to think it hardly worth your while to come and see me here. It was because of all this that I told Noble I would not come home. But now that you are here, I must tell you as much as I can, as much as I have breath to tell you. I owe it to myself to explain a little. It was a woman that misguided me. I suppose it's unmanly to say that—I suppose that a man whose life has been wrecked by a woman ought, if he has a spark of manly honor in him, to hold his tongue about her work and take all the blame for it on his own shoulders. And Heaven knows, I'm willing to do that. I'm quite willing to take the blame on my own shoulders. Because, after all, you see, she couldn't very well have made me go wrong if I hadn't been too weak in character to resist her. Yet, in [illegible] of keeping silence about her—why, I don't think the obligation is the same when the man is very young and inexperienced and soft-hearted, and she's a hard-hearted woman of the world, twenty-odd years older. In point of fact, she's more than twenty years older than I am; more like twenty-five or twenty-seven years older. And you know now that sort of woman, especially if she's rich and handsome still, and dresses well, influences a young man. All my life I'd heard fellows say that a woman of that age is ten times more dangerous than a girl; and now I've found out the bitter truth of the saying on my own account. I did as they all do—I fell in love with her."

"Who was she? What is her name?" Christine breathed very low, yet with an intense, indignant eagerness in her voice.

"She was—and is—Mrs. Crookenden."

The girl started violently, remembering only just in time how weak he was, and how necessary it was to spare him any show of emotion in herself.

"Do you mean the Mrs. Crookenden that we know?" she asked with tense anxiety. "Do you mean the millionaire? The woman whose name is on everybody's lips in London now, just as if she were royal?"

The young fellow who was lying on his deathbed made sign of assent.

"Yes. They make her a favorite, don't they? The fools! There aren't many royal people who are half as important. It's not much wonder that a young fellow of no particular significance in the world feels his head turning when she hints to him that she loves him, is it? What are you trembling for?"

"She—she—" murmured Christine, and then got no farther. Her face was suffused with a sudden crimson, and she seemed to be choking. How many more of her family's sorrows and disasters were to be attributed to the influence of this one supremely wealthy, and therefore supremely powerful woman, who appeared to be their evil genius?

"Of course, she wasn't quite so rich and so powerful then," Ronald Dare proceeded to say, but speaking more faintly, as if even his last poor remnant of strength was beginning to fail him. "But even then she was quite wealthy and powerful enough to be thought a lot of in the world, and to do mischief. Do you know that the people whom she has ruined—and they number hundreds, yes, and thousands—call her the Great Vampire, the pitiless oppressor of the poor and the weak? I didn't know that when first I met her and was fascinated by her evident liking for me. That was two years ago. The liking soon warmed into love—real love on my part, blind and foolish as I was, and pretended love on hers. She made me promise that I would obey her wishes in all things, and follow her anywhere. I never realized what I was promising. When I was ordered to India she said she would be coming out some day. She did come out; that was about a year and a half ago. Don't you remember it? The papers were full of her visit to India. It was like a triumphant progress. I saw her bowed down to on every hand, even by the most powerful and honorable people. And her handsomeness, her grandeur, and her power, and all that worship that people gave her turned my head. In spite of all the time she had to give to public things, she found opportunity to see me often; and every time she saw me she wove her web around me tighter, until in my silly infatuation and silly pride—not the right sort of pride, but only pride that such a wonderful woman should care for me—I would have done anything she had chosen to ask of me. She whispered to me continually that she would marry me if I would leave my regiment and turn my back on the army altogether, and go back to England on the same boat with her. She tempted me too much, and kept on asking me whether what she called mere temporary disgrace would not be a small enough price to pay for the privilege of becoming her husband and the sharer of her wealth, and at last I gave way. I was blind; I might have known that she wouldn't marry a disgraced soldier. But I gave way."

Christine drew a deep gasping breath.

"Do you mean that it was for the sake of her money, Ronald?" she asked him, with pain in her voice.

The fair-haired lad who lay dying there on the miserable bed in the yet more miserable room moved his head restlessly away from the support of her arm.

"No, not that," he denied as strongly as his growing weakness would allow. "No, it wasn't that. I hadn't sunk so low as that. It was her face—she's splendidly handsome, you know, in her dark, dignified way—and the wonderful kind of fascination that she has. If you've ever spoken to her, you can't help knowing what I mean, for she fascinates even women, if they haven't been warned against her beforehand. So she made me forget honor and duty, and bring insult and disgrace upon my father's name. And it didn't take me long to find out the true meaning of what I had done. No sooner had we reached England than she laughed at me, and told me heartlessly that she had grown tired of my society on the voyage. She even denied then that she had ever said she loved me, and she laughed and sneered at me when I reminded her that she had said she would marry me. And then I realized all the dishonor, all the scoundrelly baseness of what I had done for her sake. I understood what decent men and women must think of a subaltern who deserts in the night from the service of his Queen and country. And I saw by the newspapers that my humiliation and disgrace were not known merely in army and society circles. I saw that the whole country knew that Ronald Dare had lost all manliness, as well as all claim to be called a gentleman, and was simply a cur—nothing better. And then—"

"Yes, then—what then?" the unhappy sister breathed. She saw pain, misery, and shame changing anew his worn young countenance.

"Then it was too late to go back," he explained bitterly. "Too late to undo anything of what had been done. I had made myself a cur and a scoundrel, and I had to continue to be a cur and a scoundrel. Worse than all, I had my living to get. No doubt it would have been better if I had done away with the necessity for getting a living by taking my own life."

"That would have been an act of cowardice," Christine interposed breathlessly. "Only another act to be ashamed of, another sin to answer for to God."

He nodded again, wearily. "Yes. But it's better for me to confess that it wasn't the thought of the sinfulness of it that kept me from doing it, but sheer want of pluck—and, perhaps, too, the idea that my suicide would be another disgrace to you all, a crowning disgrace. What I had already done had cast a slur upon you—yes, even upon you, Christine, who are so innocent and dear and sweet—that the taking of my own life would have cast a worse one. People would have turned away even from you, even from your beauty saying that the family was accursed. Even your wealth—"

"I have no wealth now," the sister interposed gently, and without a trace of regret in her soft voice. "As a family, we have no wealth any more. Father's losses in one way and another have been so severe lately that we are on the brink of ruin."

The young fellow who lay sick unto death opened his despairing eyes wider.

"Ruin!" he echoed with a startled note in his faint tones. "Ruin? And Hector dead? And mother so changed that everybody in society whispers cruelly and infamously that she must be suffering from some disgraceful secret which the world cannot at present get at? And now I myself, the other son, the heir, lying here dishonored and dying! Ah yes, Christine, I am dying. You must believe this, dear, even though the belief wrings your heart. You are unhappy, too, unhappy in your love, with all your hopes shattered. And all in one year—in less than a year! I have heard people say—society people, strangers to me never dreaming who I was—I have heard them say that it looked as if there was a curse upon us. This, of course, must be nonsense, but—"

"I am not sure that it is nonsense," Christine interrupted with a new terror in her eyes. "I have felt many times that in very fact and truth there must be a curse upon us. Thus, I am convinced that it is Mrs. Crookenden who is the human agent of these troubles. I do not know why, for we have done her no harm, none, at least, that we know of. But when you are better—for you will get better, you will surely get better—we will search together for the heart of the mystery, the hidden cause of all our calamities. And now I must get a doctor—a doctor, and something good for you to eat, and a fire."

She started to her feet and looked around the miserable room. There was no grate, and there were no cupboards. The room was quite empty, except for the wretched apology of a bed on which the helpless Ronald lay.

"Ronald, have you nothing to eat here?" she cried in a sharp, wild voice of pained consternation. "Is there not even bread?"

He shook his head. She burst into tears.

"Oh, Ronnie! And I have kept on talking here when I ought to have been fetching food for you, getting a doctor and contriving warmth that would save you!"

Again the sufferer in the bed shook his head. "It's of no use, Christine," he said, trying to put some strength into his failing voice so that she might hear him clearly. "I've not had anything to eat for a long time, and I shan't need anything more. I met with that accident which led to the false report of my death just because I was starving, and got light-headed and staggered in front of the horse and van."

"Oh, don't! don't!" Christine pleaded, covering her face with her hands. But at sight of her overwhelming emotion, the helpless brother who loved her only went on the more quickly, striving the while to raise himself upon his elbow.

"You mustn't go, Christine—not to get anything. Nothing can do me any good now—neither food nor fire nor medicine. It's too late. If it hadn't been too late I shouldn't have sent for you, because, as I tried to tell you just now, I knew it would be better for the family to believe me dead than living. Oh, yes, I've got bronchitis and fever, and they're both pretty bad, but the real thing I'm dying of is starvation. I may well tell you now that I did see a doctor yesterday, a poor, hard-working fellow, who used to be among my friends, and who, as I knew, wouldn't charge me anything, and he said it was too late then, and that if I lived until this evening I should be lucky. It sounds a brutal way of putting it, but I'd told him that I wanted the truth and only the truth. And I tell it you in my turn simply so that you mayn't go away and leave me to get food or anything else before I've told you all I wanted to tell you. You might come back and find me dead, and then it would be too late. Don't sob like that, dear. It makes it so hard for me to speak. And after all, what am I for any one to lose—a poor, miserable fool who at twenty or thereabouts has made a bash of his life?"

CHAPTER XIX.

His own voice ended in something like a sob. Christine, who had been stooping over him, raised herself upright again, trying to force back her surging grief.

"You must let me go to send a telegram to mother," she said. "I'll go very quickly. You see she might still have time to get here before—before—"

She broke off, feeling herself held back by his sudden grip of the skirt of her gown.

"No. You must not," he was saying feverishly and determinedly. "It would only be to strike her a second blow just as she is recovering from the first, and the sight of me here might give her a shock from which in her weak health she would never recover. Better let things be as they are. Why should she mourn twice, who has hardly the strength to mourn once? And if the clouds are gathering so dark about our home, she has enough to suffer without grieving again over me. No. You must not leave me now, not for anything, at least, not until I have finished saying to you what I called you to me to say."

His grip had transferred itself from her dress to her hand. Yielding to him, she seated herself on the edge of the bed and listened. And she recognized with a terrible heart-pang that he had been right in saying that whatever he had to tell her must be told at once.

"I told you I had my living to get," he continued hurriedly. "Well, she, Mrs. Crookenden, coolly and sneeringly pointed out to me a way by which I might get it. And that way was to become her spy and secret agent. When I hesitated she taunted me with my own dishonor, and said that pride could surely stand no longer in the way of one who had fallen so low as I had fallen. She wanted me to use the knowledge of important and highly-placed people which I had gained in friendship as a means of successful spying upon the private actions of those people with a view to obtaining information which could place them in her power."

Christine had locked her hands tightly together in her pain at this confession.

"And you did it?" she now gasped out, reading the truth in his face. "You did it?"

"Yes, I did it," Ronald admitted grimly, clenching tightly the hand which did not hold her wrist. "I could not help myself. I had not got used to the idea of starvation then as I have got used to it now, and it seemed to me then I had no choice. Besides, she had threatened to punish me if I should refuse by revealing to the world my skulking place, and also by stating in public that I had already done the infamous sort of work for her. I was helpless in her grip, you see. And, after all, I had already sunk so low that nothing else seemed to matter. And as I took the sneak's money, and did it as well as ever a man who had been born a sneak could have done it. It was not the pay that tempted me. The pay was only just enough to keep me at the business for sheer bread. She was too clever a woman to pay me well."

"And you kept on at the work?"

His wild blue eyes appealed to her.

"What else could I do?" They and his voice cried out together. "What else could I do? What can a dishonored (unutterably young) man do when he has to earn his next day's dinner? I was not only destitute, but afraid to show my face anywhere, and you must remember that by touching the dirty work at all I had given her a hold of me sufficient to keep me at it. When I had once done it she would no longer have been telling a lie, but the truth, in exposing me to the world as having done it. And the truth is difficult to meet."

"But if she had done so she would have been exposing her own secret methods of business too," Christine put in quickly. "Did you not think of that?"

"She would have found some way of getting out of it without losing anything and perhaps without even a smirch," he returned in a desperate tone of conviction. "She is clever enough to protect herself from any real risks. A man once said to me that even the cleverest financial men had never found a loophole in her armor yet."

Christine set her lips tightly.

"Perhaps innocence and prayer might find such a loophole where cunning could not do so," she said after a pause.

The sick brother, whose hours were numbered, looked at her with something of a bitter smile on his lips.

"I've never found prayer do anything yet," he said almost defiantly.

She slipped down from her seat again, and in an instant was kneeling beside him, sending full into his challenging eyes the clear white light of faith that was in her beautiful ones that were as windows of her soul.

"Ronald, you must not say that," she cried passionately, reproachfully, warningly. "You must not think of it. You must not die believing it! Oh, Ronnie, Ronnie, do you think that because we suffer so much at the hands of those who do not love God that God is careless, heedless, and that He will not see that in the end, however far off that end may be, the right will prevail? Ronald, tell me that you do not think this, that you do not think it in your heart, but only spoke hastily and rashly. Tell me this, if you love me."

Very sadly the blue eyes looked at her out of the face that was still so boyish, in spite of the bitterness marked upon it.

"I will try to have faith if it will please you that I should, Christine," he answered her. "I had it once, you know, but I have since lost it. Is it any wonder that I lost it? But perhaps if you pray it will come to me again, though I feel that I have gone too far astray to be worth saving now. I wonder if you know what sort of secret service means that I have been doing for this woman whom so many fools admire and honor. I'll tell you one of the things I've done. I've taken a place as footman for a week or two in the house of a peer whom our father and mother count among their friends, and I've stolen documents from his private cabinet like a common thief, and handed them over to my employer. She knows I shan't tell on her, partly because I'm a gentleman, and partly because I should get myself into trouble worse trouble than I should get her into. For it was I who did the stealing, you see, and she can prove that. On the other hand, I had no proof whatever to support any accusation I might have made against her. She's too clever to deal with her secret servants by means of letters; all her arrangements with them are made by word of mouth."

Probably there is no reason to doubt the sincerity of an army mule that supports the back-to-the-farm movement.

An umbrella is not in it with that morning-after feeling for keeping some men dry, especially on election day.

Farmers Relieve the Unemployed

Grey and Bruce Counties Helping Unemployment in the Cities

The counties of Grey and Bruce are doing their share towards helping out the question of unemployment in the big cities. During the last few days over two hundred of Toronto's idle men have been placed on Ontario farms. Rev. I. A. Miller of the farm section of the unemployment bureau can place several hundred more. The farmers of Grey and Bruce are taking a number of men, and relate their own experiences on the farm. Some novel suggestions are being made for utilizing the vacant houses in some of the villages to good advantage. "Every thing is in the hired man's favor now," said one farmer who succeeded in getting two men to go to his farm.

Mr. J. M. Davis, ex-reeve of Raphaelsonship, Grey county, was amongst those who secured help from the farm section of the employment bureau, Toronto. He engaged two married men and a boy. Mr. Davis is somewhat particular, no tobacco users with him. He says there is a gorgeous opportunity for the right kind of men to make good, and quotes his own experiences as an example of what work can do. Forty years ago Mr. Davis came to Grey county with a dollar and a half and to day owns several hundred acres and is comparatively wealthy. He has two empty houses on the land, and will put his two married men in these houses.

"Twelve years ago I hired a boy who worked with me eight years. That boy to-day has rented a farm and is worth three or four thousand. He is a good fellow. I think I am doing patriotic work in helping these men to do something like that."

A novel and exceedingly practical plan was suggested to Rev. Mr. Millet of the employment bureau a few days ago by the Warden of Bruce County, Mr. Alex. McCannel, who called at the office to procure help. Mr. McCannel is a prosperous farmer near Port Elgin. His farm adjoins the small village of Burgoyne, a typical Ontario hamlet, once more prosperous than it is now. In the village there are three or four empty houses and Mr. McCannel purposes that these should be used for the hired help. On numerous farms throughout that section there are vacant houses, and these, he thinks, would solve the farm problem in the housing of men and their families. He thinks this might be taken up all over the province and those idle houses be put back to use. It would not only go far to help out in the labor problem, but bring back to a depopulated province some of the old population, and the old lively country of twenty years ago.

It is likely that Mr. McCannel's suggestion will be acted upon by other farmers now that their attention has been drawn to it.

The story of one of the "wise men" was told. Leslie Simpson, a young Scot from Aberdeen, was never on a farm in his life. He was a machinist and while out of work last autumn came to the conclusion that if he could get on a farm for the winter he would be doing well. Accordingly he hired with a good farmer near Orangeville. He went to Toronto a few days ago and is looking for a job at his old trade. He was content with his winter on the farm and said that he had been well looked after, and he looks like it. Instead of being half starved and walking the streets of the city he has some money, is healthy, happy and not very particular whether he gets a job as a machinist or not. He can go back to the farm. His story is a happy contrast to those of hardship told during the winter. It may be said, however, that there are many who want to hire out and sometimes the farmers are at fault in not informing the office when they have secured help.

THE FLY NUISANCE

The common house fly, notwithstanding the campaign of destruction which has been waged against it, is still one of the dangerous pests with which civilization is afflicted. Thus certain conditions which have been created and maintained by the people themselves, the house fly continues to exist and multiply.

Persistent effort is the only insurance against the house fly. Careful prosecution renders any intermittent campaign migratory. The fly must first be attacked in its breeding place, which is that of stable manure or filth. It requires a period of about ten days for a fly to hatch and become full grown. From breeding place they scatter to food supplies, into homes, dairies and shops, carrying with them typhoid, dysentery and other disease germs.

It is not too early to take precaution against the annual attacks of the house fly pest. With the melting snow and ice manure piles should be removed and surroundings disinfected. During the summer, if it is not possible to remove accumulations of manure daily it should be kept in a closed bin or other receptacle, impervious to flies. Yards should be cleaned up and kept free from wet and rotten matter which harbors flies. Garbage cans should be cleaned out thoroughly, and disinfected. Carefully protect all food and drink from flies by wire or other screens. All doors and windows of homes should be screened, and if flies get inside they should be at once killed. Fly swatters are cheap and handy. Sticky fly papers and fly poisons are effective means of destruction. Formalin solutions are easy to prepare and may be used with success. Two methods of use are as follows: Mix two tablespoons of formaldehyde (formalin) with one pint of a mixture of milk and water. Pour into a shallow dish with a piece of bread in the centre for the flies to light on. This may be placed at the back doors of residences, in or about dairies and barns or wherever flies gather. Or a sponge plate may be filled with damp sand. Cover with a disk of blotting paper and sprinkle over it a mixture of one part of formalin to twenty parts of water.

The object to be aimed at is, however, the destruction of the house fly and any means to accomplish this will be justified.

—"It is absurd for anyone to suggest that no election should be held until after the war," declared Col. Hugh Clark, Conservative member for North Bruce, in Parliament, when the votes-to-soldiers bill was under further consideration. "This act contemplates an election during the war. (Cheers.) It would be of no use if there were not to be an election."

Stop Jewing the Farmer

From The Farmers' Advocate

A citizen of one of our Canadian towns the other day in ordering a farm product—maple syrup, by the way—grumbled at the price proposed. This is about as far as farmers can go, merely to suggest what they ought to get. The farmer is told the price of what he has to sell, and some one else dictates what he must pay for what he buys. Lately, to keep down the cost of living, it was seriously proposed that the government regulate the price of farm products. Buy food cheap, sell goods dear and have the government back you up. The banker fixes the rate of interest the farmer is to receive on his modest savings deposit, and what he is to pay (about double for a loan. The farmer is told what he may have, as per the other man's measurement, for his timber, but the cooper fixes the price of apple barrels, and a confidential price list to agents determines what he shall pay for wagons or bladers. He tosses a tax of transcontinental lines and then with some moderating by the railway commission, to the support of which he shall pay for the privilege of riding on the cars or how much will be left for him out of his hogs or wheat when marketed. He is saved the trouble of figuring out the price of sugar beets f.o.b., and his kind-hearted grocer designates what he can have for his basket of eggs and how many pounds of granulated sugar he will be permitted by somebody in Montreal to allow him to carry home for a dollar. He may have built a sugar shanty with boards at the regulation lumber yard price, and installed an expensive maple syrup plant, burned up much valuable wood, paid his land tax and a liberal wage for hired help—contributing his own labor gratis—toiled in the snow and wet of March tapping, gathering and straining sap, boiling, several times all night long, perhaps winding up with the pneumonia or a bad dose of the grippe and have to appeal from the doctor's bill or the corner drugstore prescription; then haul his up-to-inland-revenue standard syrup ten miles to town in cans which the tinsmith, acting as distributor for the big and judiciously nourished factory, was allowed to retail at "so much a piece," but for him to want so much a gallon for the syrup—oh, dearme! And the sap hadn't gone up in price. It ran out of the trees just the same as last year. Why should he undertake to put the price higher, indeed? The war taxes wouldn't amount to much, and it only took a little while to strain and clarify the syrup. Certainly he had always delivered it nice and in good measure right at the door in previous years, but oh, my! what a jolt to have the man from the woods talking about the cost of production and saying what he ought to have for things!

Editor of Paisley ADVOCATE:

DEAR SIR—Re Pinkerton hotel license, an interesting hour is expected before the license commissioners at Chepstow on Thursday, April 22nd, at 1 o'clock p.m., when the application for a license for the above mentioned hotel comes before the Board for consideration.

Mr Editor, a few weeks ago David Lloyd-George, Chancellor of the Exchequer, said, "We are fighting Germany, Austria and drink, and so far as I can see the greatest of these three deadly foes is drink." Where do Canada and the Canadians stand? Are we a part of the empire or apart from it? Where do the men whose names appear on the petition for Knox's hotel license stand? Are they lined up as loyal Canadian sons of the empire of which some of us are proud, or do they stand by Germany, Austria or drink? Lord Kitchener, Field Marshal French and our beloved king have stepped out and taken their stand. Loyalty and patriotism has been our cry, but now it is give another fellow a chance to help on our deadliest enemy.

On the petition are the names of several prominent men in our local churches, voting to deal out "liquid fire and distilled damnation," a dope for the boys and girls of our community. Did they think of the number of boys that would be required to learn the drink habit at this house? Are the above fathers preparing to furnish a boy each for the game, or are they sure that their boy will be turned down when he applies for a drink?

AN INTERESTED ONE

NEW BASIS OF SCHOOL GRANTS

The new basis of rural public school grants is on a sliding scale like the corn duties in England. Before free trade was adopted. Hitherto the grant was 40 per cent on the salary over $350, but under the new regulations the percentage varies from 40 to 20 per cent according to assessment, and the amount on which no grant is given is also increased to large sections. To give a concrete illustration: A section with an assessment of $100,000 or over will be given the minimum percentage of 20. The amount on which no grant is given is increased to $400 in such sections, therefore the grant to a section where the teacher has been receiving a salary of $500 will be 20 per cent on $100 or $20. The grant under the former system would have been $60. The ratepayers in large sections will not feel grateful to the Minister of Education for his new sliding scale. Like the French in Ottawa they may feel like running their schools without any connection with the Education Department and will then be in a position to refuse admittance to the inspector.—Enterprise.

—The Dominion Government has awakened to the scandal noise made by the investigation in connection with war contract grafts. In the House on Thursday last Premier Borden denounced two Conservative members who were involved in the charges of fraud and deception: Arthur Dewitt Foster, M.P. for Kings, N.S., and W. F. Garland, M.P. for Carleton. Foster bought up 600 horses in Kings Co., N.S., some of which were totally unfit for the service required, and failed to provide vouchers for the money expended. Garland is a druggist in Ottawa, and it was one of his clerks who made $9000 profits out of selling hospital supplies to the Government. The Premier announced that a commission of one man or three would be appointed to undertake all purchases for the militia department for the remainder of the war. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is in accord with the appointment of a commission. In his speech the Liberal leader urged that in every way expenditure made all contracts should be let by tender, dealing should be direct with the producer and manufacturer, and no favors should be shown to anyone. He deprecated the patronage system, and announced that he is ready to do his part to get rid of it forever.

OWES HER LIFE TO "FRUIT-A-TIVES"

Cured Both Stomach Trouble and Headaches

PALMERSTON, ONT., JUNE 20th, 1913.

"I really believe that I owe my life to "Fruit-a-tives". Ever since childhood, I have been under the care of physicians and have been paying doctor's bills. I was so sick and worn out that people on the street often asked me if I thought I could get along without help. The same old Stomach Trouble and distressing Headaches nearly drove me wild. Sometime ago, I got a box of "Fruit-a-tives" and the first box did me good. My husband was delighted and advised a continuation of their use.

Today, I am feeling fine, and a physician meeting me on the street, noticed my improved appearance and asked the reason. I replied, "I am taking Fruit-a-tives". He said, "Well, if Fruit-a-tives are making you look so well, go ahead and take them. They are doing more for you than I can".

MRS. H. S. WILLIAMS.

"Fruit-a-tives" are sold by all dealers at 50c. a box. 6 for $2.50, trial size 25c. or sent postpaid on receipt of price by Fruit-a-tives Limited, Ottawa.

Methods and Rates of Planting Corn

The row or drill method of planting corn is still commonly followed in Ontario and Quebec. The investigation conducted by the Seed Branch shows that 956 farmers were planting in drills at an average rate of 2.13 pecks of seed per acre, and 350 planted in squares or hills at 1.17 pecks of seed per acre. The average results of thirty-two separate tests conducted throughout Ontario for a five year period shows that the hill method gave one ton of green feed per acre more than the drills, and three-eighths of this ton was in the form of freshly husked ears. A four year average at the Experimental Farm, Ottawa, shows two and three-quarter tons per acre in favor of the hill method. Hills should be three feet apart each way and contain three or four plants. Rows should be three feet apart and the plants nine inches apart in the row. Three and a half feet spacing might be preferable for large growing varieties or weedy land. The hill method gives a much better opportunity for cultivating the land and controlling weeds, but the corn is rather more difficult to harvest than that which is grown in drills.

One bushel, 70 lbs on the ear or 56 lbs of shelled corn, germinating 95 per cent, should be sufficient to plant five acres by the hill method. One acre will require 60 cents' worth of seed at $3 per bushel. Seed corn of the same price planted at the average rate by the drill method will cost $1.60 per acre.

—The torpedo boat is small and has sides like a paper-shell pecan. One could shoot holes through it with a duck gun, and when a battleship turns loose on it the remains look like an overgrown colander. But this does not do the battleship any good because the torpedo boat has just spat a torpedo at it. A torpedo contains enough guncotton to wreck a pyramid or blast a hint into the head of a New Haven railroad director. When a torpedo explodes under a battleship the latter tries to sail without a bottom for about two minutes and then gives it up as a bad job. Torpedo boats are not made to defend themselves, but to go to places in a hurry and get away with equal enthusiasm. A torpedo boat travels forty miles any hour and is stuffed so full of engines that the crew have to sleep on the pantry shelves and the cylinder heads. Cruising around in a slim, young torpedo boat with a great desire to turn over in a storm is not so comfortable as automobile racing or riding in the caboose of a local freight. After a man has lived for a few months in one of these boats, holding onto a hot pipe with one hand and eating cold beans out of a can with the other, and falling out of his berth ten times a night while the boat tangoes in the heavy seas, he is likely to sign for a soft bed on the quarter deck of a bucking broncho. All nations maintain vast numbers of torpedo boats and would cheerfully sacrifice half a dozen of them to sink an enemy's battleship. This is why we do not yearn for torpedo boating as a recreation.—Ex.

—Don't look down upon the laborer. Don't despise him because he can't wear as good clothes as you do. Don't think that you're any better than he is, because you are not. He is a producer of wealth for some one, though he may not reap the full benefits of his industry. His traducer may be a parasite on his own family, a parasite on the state or a burden to the community. Shame on the man, we say, who despises honest toil and looks down with disdain on the honest toiler. The world would fare badly were it not for the man who labors and toils in the midst of unenviable surroundings. Not only those who engage in menial occupations are toilers. It isn't the application of the physical energies only that constitute labor. The man engaged in useful mental pursuits is just as much a toiler as the man whose only product comes from his physical exertions. If the circumstances and conditions of his surroundings are such as to permit him to wear better clothing, that will never make him better than the menial toiler he may feel disposed to despise. The real value of the man is in the man himself and not in the clothes he wears. Don't fool yourself by thinking the man who works may be classed as your inferior. If he is, it isn't because of the position he holds.

"VIM"

This stirring poem is being enclosed in all the garments and packages sent to the Canadian soldiers in the hospitals and at the front by the Canadian Red Cross Society.

Did you face the trouble that came your way
With a resolute heart and cheerful?
Or turn your soul from the light of day
With a craven heart and fearful?

Oh, a trouble's a ton or a trouble's a pound,
Or a trouble is what you make it:
But it isn't the fact that you're hurt that counts,
But only—how did you take it?

You're beaten to earth? Well, well, what's that?
Come up with a smiling face!
It's nothing against you to be knocked flat,
But to lie there—that's disgrace.

The harder you're thrown, the higher you bounce;
Be proud of your blackened eye!
It isn't the fact that you're hurt that counts
But how did you fight—and why?

And tho' you be done to death, what then?
If you did the best you could,
If you played your part in the world of men,
The critic will call it good.

Death comes with a crawl or comes with a pounce,
But whether 'tis slow or spry,
It isn't the fact that you're dead that counts,
But only—how did you die?

Typhoid and Cocoanut Milk.

An English writer tells of a colored woman in Trinidad who was dying, beyond all hope, of typhoid, and pleaded to be allowed to drink of cocoanut juice. She was beyond the reach of good or harm, so she had her cocoanuts and drank the juice, not of one but of eight in succession—perhaps a gallon of liquid, and the virgin indisputably saved her life.

Hearing Heart Beats.

If you hear your heart beat in one ear, as many persons do, it is no proof of anything wrong with the heart. It is much more likely to be a local defect such as chronic catarrh of the middle ear or stiffness and retraction at the drum. This on the authority of Dr. Robert H. Babcock of Chicago.

The Other Story

"That is a habit you must overcome," said Aunt Honora with decision as her niece, Mrs. Leeds, returned from bidding good-bye to Mrs. Stevens, the minister's wife. The walk from the sitting-room to the piazza was the longest Mrs. Leeds had taken unaided since she came back from the hospital the week before.

"Habit," she exclaimed, as she leaned against the door for a moment. "I thought the habit of walking was an excellent one for an invalid."

"Walking!" sniffed Aunt Honora. "Talking would be more to the point."

"Did I talk too much?" Mrs Leeds asked. "I was so glad to see Mrs. Stevens that I forgot the doctor's advice."

Aunt Honora looked at her niece over her gold-rimmed glasses, crocheted another scallop, and asked:

"How many appendicitis recitals do you suppose Mrs. Stevens has listened to since she came to Norwall?"

"Why, I don't know," Mrs. Leeds answered. "Several of my friends have had operations for appendicitis during the last ten years."

"And as many who are not your particular friends," continued her aunt. "Mrs. Stevens doubtless called on every one of them within two weeks of their return from the hospital. I have no doubt she has heard the same story not less than twenty times."

"The same story!" Mrs. Leeds exclaimed. "My case was the worst ever——"

"They all are," quoth Aunt Honora. "One story differs from another only in the choice of adjectives."

"But Mrs. Stevens seemed interested——"

"In every detail of your operation," finished Aunt Honora. "Of course she did—that was her business. But I pitied her from the bottom of my heart, for I knew how much more interested she would have been in the side lights."

"The side lights?"

"Yes, the side lights," repeated Aunt Honora. "The side lights of hospital life that you have given me from day to day. The story of the poor woman who never once looked about her after the nurses put her to bed, but covered her face with the sheets and cried. And after she had enjoyed that luxury a few minutes, she felt something fall on her forehead, and putting out her hand, she found a slip of paper weighted with a lemon drop. And on the paper she read: 'Dear New Friend. Look out. I want to get acquainted with you. Your right hand neighbor.'"

"And the Woman did look out," Mrs Leeds went on, "and saw in the bed next to hers the smiling, motherly face of the broken-hip patient—and decided that she, too, would like to get acquainted. And when her eyes were wholly dried, she was introduced to all the other patients in the ward. In half an hour the newcomer discovered that the dreaded hospital ward was only a large room in which there were eleven women who were anxious to become her friends. And so the woman forgot to worry about her husband and four small children, and laughed and told stories with the rest—and in three weeks she was renewed in body and in mind. Why, I never thought of telling Mrs. Stevens about her, or the laughing-eyed girl in the chair who travelled from bed to bed writing letters for the patients—such letters! or the florist's wife who divided her beautiful flowers among us. I really wonder, Aunt Honora, if—yes, there is Deacon Lowry's wife. I will try it on her."

Treatment of Smut.

Commissioner Clark, writing in the Agricultural War Book on "Treatment for Smut Prevention," says that in Eastern Canada there is considerable smut in the grain crops each year, but that it has not been sufficiently prevalent to make treatment for its prevention general. The losses, however, are much greater than is commonly realized, and the value of the crop could be considerably increased if treatment for smut prevention were more generally practiced. Over half the samples of fall wheat collected in Ontario contain smut, and it is also very common in the spring crops, especially oats. Reports on the samples treated indicate that formalin, one pound in forty gallons of water, is much more popular than bluestone as a preventive.

Care for the Birds.

Dr. C. Gordon Hewitt, Dominion Entomologist, urges farmers to encourage birds by building nesting boxes and leaving birds undisturbed on woodlots. Bushes and thickets should be permitted to grow for birds' shelter. He says very few of our birds are really harmful, and most of them destroy enormous quantities of insects. Dr. Hewitt asserts that too much stress cannot be laid on the urgency of protecting native birds. Farmers should never permit shooting of wild birds. —Canadian Forestry Journal.

WIT AND WISDOM.

Some men are good because they find it cheaper than being bad.

Some men who boast that they pay as they go never manage to get very far.

Men wouldn't care how much their wives talked if they would only use the sign language.

Newspaper advertising is the least expensive and most productive of all forms of advertising.

"Have you ever thought seriously of marriage, sir?" "Indeed I have; ever since the ceremony."

"Was it a bad accident?" "Well, I was knocked speechless and my wheel was knocked spokeless."

Things show the true nature of a man more than humor. The finest humor comes from the finest spirit.

"Somehow you seem to have grown shorter instead of taller since I last saw you." "Well, I've married and settled down."

Teacher—"Have you ever seen bananas growing?" Archibald—"No, ma'am; I never had time to stand and watch them."

If you succeed in convincing a girl that she has beautiful hands her mother will have to do the dish washing thereafterward.

"What are the relations now between your wife and yourself?" "Oh, only her mother, two uncles a sister and a few cousins."

"Did he propose to her?" "Well, he pressed his suit." "Why didn't he suit?" "Because he hadn't pressed his suit before he came."

A woman is capable of a higher, nobler and more unselfish love than that of a man, and she often sacrifices herself for those she loves.

"Do you mean to say, Pat, that your last master treated you better than I do?" "Yes, sorr," replied the Irishman—"and oftener."

Rich Uncle Ebenezer—"So you are named after me, are you?" Small Nephew—"Yes, ma said it was too bad, but we wanted your money badly."

If you would be happy keep your mind and your heart full of kind thoughts for others. If you would be miserable just think about and pity yourself.

Septimus (he delights to quote Scripture)—"The way of the transgressor is hard." Bobby Marshall—"Yes, but the trouble is that it's usually hard on somebody else."

"What's that piece of cord tied around your finger for?" "My wife put it there to remind me to post a letter." "And did you post it?" "No; she forgot to give it to me."

Old Husband—"Didn't you marry me for my money? Answer me that, madam!" Young Wife—"Certainly I did. And we'd get along splendidly if you were not so mean with it."

O'Brien—"Come home an' take supper wid me, Flannigan." Flannigan—"Shure it's past yer supper time, and it's furious yer wife'll be." O'Brien—That's just it; she can't lick the two av us."

Coronor—"We found nothing in the man's pockets, ma'am, except three buttons, one handkerchief and a receipted bill. The Sobbing Inquirer—"A receipted bill. Thou taint my husband!"

Marjorie—"Angelina doesn't like her new gown. It's pretty and all that, but she thinks it still needs something to improve its shape." Mabel—"Well, why doesn't she let some other girl wear it?"

Irishman—"What would a man be that was born in Ireland, christened in Scotland, married in England and died in America?" English Irishman—"I don't know; what would he be?" Irishman—"A corpse."

"Tommy," said the Sunday school teacher, who had been giving lessons on the baptismal covenant, "can you tell me the two things necessary to baptism?" "Yes'm," said Tommy, "water and a baby."

"Well, my boy," said the visitor to Bobby, "I suppose some day you expect to step into your father's shoes?" "Oh, I suppose so," said Bobby, gloomily. "I been wearin' out everythin' else he wears since mother learned how to cut 'em down for me."

Scot Invents Mine Destroyer.

Dr. Walford Bodin, who has already offered two of his latest electrical inventions to the British Government—a mine destroyer, and submarine searchlight — has just completed another invention, which he calls a Bodicite shell. He claims that when the shell is fired near a trench or amongst a regiment, the fumes, although perfectly harmless to the enemy, places them for a time hors de combat, making the foe helpless long enough for the allies to dash in and take them prisoners. Each shell is powerful enough to overcome at least 500 men. He has offered this invention to the Government, and his own services for base hospital work, besides offering his own home, the Manor House, Macduff, and 20 beds for an emergency hospital.

Pushed Off the Dock.

"She hesitated a long while. I wonder how she finally came to decide to take the matrimonial plunge."

"I think her younger sisters pushed her off the dock, so to speak."

KITCHENER, THE SILENT.

Interesting Comment Made by an Authority.

"He lives," says Mr. A. G. Gardiner, in writing of Lord Kitchener, "in deeds, not words. No one of his time has at once said so little and done so much. Nor has any one of his time gone so far with so entire a reliance on his own merits and so complete a scorn of the arts of advertisement. There is about him something of the quality of General Kleber, of whom it was said that it made men brave to look at him. If he does not make you feel brave, at least he makes you feel strong. But he has not the magic that Napoleon exercised over the minds of men, nor the apocalyptic fervor with which Cromwell fired them, nor the swift instinct by which Charles XII. assured them of victory. His mind is slow and ponderous; but it moves with the mass and the certainty of the Nasmyth hammer. Perhaps the man of genius would crack the nut without the hammer; but at all events Kitchener does crack the nut. He belongs to the school of Wellington or Grant more than to the school of Napoleon or Lee. He will "fight it out on that line if it takes all summer." He has the patience of Torres Vedras rather than the swift inspiration of Austerlitz. His merit, in short, is for organization rather than for battle. He is not a great warrior but, like Carnot or Moltke, a great organizer of victory. Both in Egypt and in South Africa his record was that of the engineer slowly sapping and mining the fastnesses of the enemy, here building a railway to penetrate the desert, there carrying out a vast scheme of blockhouses to round up the Boers—striking only when his schemes were complete and the hour had struck.

"His probity is splendid. No army ever had such a cleansing fire. Corruption, jobbery, intrigue fled before him. While he was in South Africa the contractor was held in an iron grasp. It was only when he left for India that the infamous tale of plunder, exposed by the War Stores Commission, began. In India he found the Army overrun with the friends of some powerful personage—not infrequently a lady. He swept the stables clean. It used to be said that the home-coming ships were filled with rubbish that he had ruthlessly discarded. He has only one test for men. It is no use pointing out that the candidate is good at polo, that his uncle is the Duke of Blankshire, and that he was at Eton. His test is Napoleon's—'What has he done?' If he doesn't answer that successfully he has no use for him even though he were his own brother. His fidelity to the public interest has made him the most economical general of his time. After his conquest of the Soudan, Lord Salisbury said of him that he was the only general who had fought a campaign for less than £300,000. Has he been promised to fight it for. And Lord Cromer declared that if he had not been one of the first generals of the world he would have been one of the first Chancellors of the Exchequer.

"Egypt, the land of mysteries over which the Sphinx looks out with inscrutable and immemorial calm, is the proper home of this silent, phinx-like man. It was there that he got his foot on the ladder. He left Palestine, where he had been working for the Exploration Fund, and offered himself for the new Egyptian cavalry. It is one of the little ironies of history that he was nearly rejected because he rode so badly. But for a complacent examiner he would have remained in the backwater of the Engineers, waiting for a pension. . . It is a comment on the futility of little tests. And it is in Egypt that his most enduring work has been done. He found the Egyptian troops 'splendid soldiers if only they would not run away.' He taught them not to run away. With them he won back the Soudan and brought peace and the railway into the desert."

The Russian Commander-in-Chief.

The Grand Duke Nicholas (writes a visitor to North Berwick) has frequently played golf there. I have heard one of his caddies remark, "He isna muckle o' a gowfer; we dinna tak' muckle notice o' him here." Yet he is enthusiastic enough wearing little else when he plays than a shirt and grey trousers. Once the old plain-spoken worthy who kept the ginger beer shanty on the links flew a couple of flags in honor (as the duke thought) of his presence. "It is very good of you," graciously said the duke, "to pay me this compliment." "Na, na!" replied the Scot, "It's no' for you: it's for a better man nor you—it's for Mr. Balfour." Doubtless the duke, who speaks English well, understood the drift of this reply, which he took quite good-humoredly.

The increasing industrial use of wood alcohol has created conditions of carelessness in the handling of it. Wood alcohol is an active poison, and all bottles, cans or other containers of this liquid should be plainly and conspicuously marked "Poison."

GRAEME THOMSON.

"The Greatest Transport Officer Since Noah."

A few weeks ago the name of Graeme Thomson would have conveyed nothing to the great British public. To-day it suggests to everybody the sudden and well-merited rise to reputation of a man who has done the State some service during his months of warfare. The hour produces the man, and at the Admiralty, as well as at the War Office and in the field, the right person has appeared in not a few instances. It is in accordance with the generous and outspoken nature of the First Lord that when he sees outstanding merit in a colleague he permits no official pedantry to hold him silent. And so, in his memorable statement of February 15, Mr. Churchill let the nation know to whom it is indebted for the unparalleled feats of sea-transport by which our navy has been kept in abundant supplies and our vast armies carried overseas without the loss of a single life or mishap to a single ship. That man is Mr. Graeme Thomson, who four months ago was superintending clerk in the Admiralty transport under Rear-Admiral H. W. Savory, and who is now director of that department. During November Mr. Thomson was made assistant director, and on December 1, when Admiral Savory retired, he became director. Mr. Churchill has alluded to him as "one of the discoveries of the war." That discovery began when Mr. Thomson, as superintending clerk, first came into contact with the First Lord, who marked him as "a very likely man." Very soon he was placed in full control of a section of the transport, where he showed such mastery of detail and administrative ability that he was promoted to the second step already noted. It was not long before the First Lord, now assured of his man by daily consultations, put him in his present position of huge responsibility. His rise has been extraordinarily rapid—it probably creates a "record"; but Mr. Thomson has earned it all. And long years of preparation, 14 in the Admiralty service, have gone to fit him for his task. He is a native of Cheshire; but, as his name implies, he is of Scottish lineage, a son in matters academic of William of Wykeham, for he is a member of both William's foundations, Winchester College and New College, Oxford. From New College he passed to the Admiralty as a higher division clerk. His record is now before the world in Mr. Churchill's eulogy: "A man who stepped into the place when the emergency came, who has organized and presided over performances and transactions the like of which were never contemplated by any State in history." Mr. Thomson is not yet 40; to be precise, he is 39, and he is the youngest director of naval transport the British Admiralty has ever known. He takes his blushing honors modestly. "There is really nothing in it," he said to the inevitable interviewer; but the public is inclined to think that there is a good deal in it. Over one million men, to say nothing of colossal stores, carried without mishap in the face of the enemy, is a considerable performance. As the Admiralty they are said to parody Sir George White's epigram on Sir Edward Ward and to call Mr. Thomson "the greatest transport officer since Noah."

Overdraw.

The banks, by order, will agree
No overdrafts must honored be,
But what will tradywife now say
Should banks her cheques refuse to pay!

War and Tips.

The Gourmand—I suppose you've had to put up with "Tipperary" ever since the war started?

The Waiter (his labors unrewarded)—Yes, sir, and tip a rarity.

Knocked Her Absht.

Rather unexpected was the reply of a Mrs. Tommy Atkins to a gentleman who inquired if her husband was at the front. "Yus," she said; "an' I 'ope 'e'll serve the Germans as 'e served me.

Life Insurance.

It is secretly and by stealth, and also with trepidation, that a man goes about the business of insuring his life. Intuition tells him that his wife, if he gave her his confidence, would denounce the project and be grieved by it; and for his own part, he cannot help shrinking at the thought of the steps that it demands. He contemplates the annual or semiannual payment that the engagement imposes on him with less concern than offering himself to the medical examiner for approval or rejection. Unaware of any serious physical disabilities, he yet does not know what fatal defects the skilled investigator may discover; and if he has indeed only a precarious hold upon life, he would much rather not be told of it.

But the persuasions of the life-insurance agent and his own uneasy conscience, which reminds him that he has not made provision for his family in the event of his untimely demise, prevail over his apprehension, and he presents himself for medical inspection. Let us assume that he finds it a less fearful ordeal than he had anticipated, and that the doctor, instead of looking grave and keeping an ominous silence, congratulates him on his large chest expansion and vigorous heart action—gives him, in short, a clean bill of health. He emerges from the interview a happy man, in a glow of kindliness for all the world and of particular esteem for himself. It has been, he thinks, worth his while to be thoroughly overhauled by a physician, if only to be told that he is all right; otherwise, he might have done a lot of needless worrying about his health. Now he need never give it a moment's thought. What a blessing! Also, the conscientious that he has done his duty by his family is elevating; feeling that he need no longer have a secret from his wife, and hopefully expectant of praise and gratitude, he goes home and tells her what he has done.

Perhaps she rewards him as he anticipates; but it is quite as likely that she will be distressed and disturbed, and feel that he would never have insured his life if he had not been going to die. Even after he has striven to remove this conviction from her mind, she will probably declare that the idea of life insurance is revolting to her; that she does not want to be financially compensated for his death, and that she wishes he had arranged to make some other use of his savings.

But this disconcerting attitude changes in time, and the wife as well as the husband come to recognize the importance of life insurance. Just what proportion of savings should be invested in it is a question that each man must decide for himself; but that some proportion should be so applied is desirable in the case of almost everyone. The virtue of sacrifice is united to that of thrift, and the home that is the man's pride rests upon a more secure foundation. —Youth's Companion.

When Animals Sleep.

Elephants sleep standing up. When in a herd a certain number will always stand watch while the others sleep, for the big, powerful beasts are timid and cautious at night and will not go to sleep unguarded.

Bats sleep head downward, hanging by their hind claws.

Birds, with few exceptions, sleep with their heads turned tailward over the back and the beak thrust beneath the wing.

Storks, gulls and other long-legged birds sleep standing on one leg.

Ducks sleep on open water. To avoid drifting ashore, they keep paddling with one foot, thus making them more in a circle.

Foxes and wolves sleep curled up, their noses and the soles of their feet close together and blanketted by their bushy tail.

Lions, tigers and cat animals stretch themselves out flat upon the side. Their muscles twitch and throb, indicating that they are light and restless sleepers.

Owls, in addition to their eyelids, have a screen that they draw sideways across their eyes to shut out the light, for the sleep in daytime.

It takes an unusually cheerful liar to make a living at it.

Treatment of Painful Feet.

The discomfort and distress that pain in the feet causes are very great, and few persons are likely to neglect a condition that forces itself so constantly on their attention. When corns cause the pain, they can be removed by moderate paring and the application of a salicylic acid paste every night. Any physician can write the formula for this paste. A bunion of ordinary severity is usually greatly relieved by forcing the great toe over toward the inner side of the foot by means of a pad between the first and second toes, and by wearing a bunion plaster, which prevents friction on the apex of the bunion. Of course the shoe must be so shaped that it permits the toe to stay in the line of the foot.

The early pain of flatfoot can be quieted by having both sole and heel of the shoe made wedge-shaped, with the thick edge on the inner side. That throws the weight of the body on the outer side of the foot. Sometimes the sufferer has to have an "arch" in the sole of the shoe, but he had better do without it if he can, and discard it as soon as the arch ceases to show signs of giving way. Cold douches, or alternate cold and hot douches, will also strengthen the fibrous structures that normally hold up the arch of the foot.

It is much more difficult to relieve the opposite condition—an overhigh arch. Orthopedic treatment, by stretching with an appropriate apparatus, or even more serious operative work, is often necessary.

The gouty, rheumatic, or "uric-acid" foot is cured by the dietetic and medicinal measures that relieve the disordered condition of the system. Some alleviation will follow if the feet are bathed morning and evening in a strong solution of Epsom salts, and it is often possible to get temporary relief from "anti-gout" and "antirheumatic" remedies; but a permanent and lasting cure depends on strict attention to the diet. That should contain no animal food, except an occasional wing of chicken, milk, eggs (in great moderation), and a little fish, and there should be no tea or coffee or alcohol. A course of baths at some mineral spring often supplements the diet cure to advantage, but that is something for the physician to recommend.

Dickens' Cat.

Charles Dickens was a lover of animals, and, like all true lovers, he was likely to become the slave of his pets. Williamina, a little white cat, was a favorite with the entire household, but showed an especial devotion to its master. She selected a corner of his study for her kittens, and brought them in from the kitchen one by one. Mr. Dickens had them taken away again, but Williamina only brought them quietly back. Again they were removed, but the third time of their return she did not leave them in the corner. Instead, she placed them at her master's feet, and, taking her stand beside them, looked imploringly up at him. That settled the question. Thereafter the kittens belonged to the study, and they made themselves royally at home, swarming on the curtains, playing about the writing-table, and scampering behind the bookshelves.

Most of the family were given away; only one remained, entirely deaf, and known, from her devotion to Dickens, as "the master's cat." This little creature followed him about like a dog, and sat beside him while he wrote.

One evening Dickens was reading by a small table whereon stood a lighted candle. As usual the cat was at his elbow. Suddenly the light went out. Dickens was much interested in his book, and he proceeded to relight the candle, striking the cat as he did so. Afterwards he remembered that puss had looked at him some what reproachfully while she received the caress. It was only when the light again became dim that the reason of her melancholy suddenly dawned upon him. Turning quickly, he found her deliberately putting out the candle with her paw, and again she looked at him appealingly. She was lonesome; she wanted to be petted, and this was her device for gaining her end.

SPRING REMINDERS OF RHEUMATISM

Raw, Damp Weather Starts the Pain, But the Trouble Lies in the Blood

Spring weather is bad for rheumatic sufferers. The changes from mild to cold, the raw, damp winds start the aches and twinges, or in the more extreme cases, the tortures of the trouble going. But it must be borne in mind that it is not the weather that causes rheumatism. The trouble is rooted in the blood—the changeable weather merely starts the pains. The only way to reach the trouble and to cure it is through the blood. The poisonous rheumatic acids must be driven out. Liniments and rubbing may give temporary relief, but cannot possibly cure the trouble. The sufferer is only wasting time and money with this kind of treatment, and all the time the trouble is becoming more deeply rooted—harder to cure. There is just one speedy cure for rheumatism—Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. They act directly on the impure, acid-tainted blood. They purify and strengthen it and thus root out the cause of the rheumatism. Here is strong proof of the above statements. Mr. J. Routley, Sydney, Man., says: "I was so badly crippled with rheumatism in my hips and knees that I could hardly go about. I began the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, which I took steadily for a couple of months, by which time all traces of the trouble had disappeared. I can most strongly recommend the Pills to all rheumatic sufferers."

Sold by all medicine dealers or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

"VIM."

(This stirring poem is being enclosed in all garments and packages sent to the Canadian soldiers in the trenches and at the front by the Canadian Red Cross Society.)

Did you face the trouble that came your way
With a resolute heart, and cheerful?
Or turn your soul from the light of day
With a craven heart, and fearful?

Oh, a trouble's a ton, or a trouble's a pound,
Or a trouble is what you make it;
But it isn't the fact that you're hurt that counts,
But only—how did you take it?

You're beaten to earth? Well, well, what's that?
Come up with a smiling face!
It's nothing against you to be knocked flat,
But to lie there—that's disgrace.

The harder you're thrown, the higher you bounce;
Be proud of your blackened eye!
It isn't the fact that you're hurt that counts,
But how did you fight—and why?

And tho' you be done to death, what then?
If you did the best that you could,
If you played your part in the world of men,
Why, the critic will call it good.

Death comes with a crawl, or comes with a pounce,
But whether it's slow or spry,
It isn't the fact that you're dead that counts,
But only—how did you die?

Does It Now.

THE WAY OUT

Change of Food Brought Success and Happiness.

A ambitious but delicate girl, after failing to go through school on account of nervousness and hysteria, found in Grape-Nuts the only thing that seemed to build her up and furnish her the peace of health.

"From infancy," she says, "I have not been strong. Being ambitious to learn at any cost I finally got to the High School but soon had to abandon my studies on account of nervous prostration and hysterics.

"My food did not agree with me, and I grew thin and despondent. I could not enjoy the simplest social affair for I suffered constantly from nervousness in spite of all sorts of medicines.

"This wretched condition continued until I became interested in the letters of those who had cases like mine and who were being helped by eating Grape-Nuts.

"I had little faith, but procured a pkg. and after the first dish I experienced a peculiar satisfied feeling that I had never gained from any ordinary food. I slept and rested better that night and in a few days began to grow stronger.

"I had a new feeling of peace and restfulness. In a few weeks, to my great joy, the headaches and nervousness left me and life became bright and hopeful. I resumed my studies and later taught ten months with ease — using grape-Nuts every day. I am now the mistress of a happy home, and the old weakness has never returned."

BITS BY THE WAY.

Centenarians are more frequently met with in warm countries than in cold ones.

The Scottish, Irish, Welsh and Breton tongues are all varieties of the Celtic language.

About 300 species of turtle and tortoises are known. Some of these attain a very large size.

In Austria a man and woman are supposed to be capable of conducting a home of their own from the age of 14.

The soil in China is so rich that a square mile is said to be capable of supporting a population of nearly 4,000 people.

False teeth of ivory, on plates of the same material, and held in place by gold wires, were in use in the year 1000 B.C.

The cold of Siberia is so great in winter that many kinds of provisions, which are with us either sealed up or salted, are there kept by simply freezing.

THOUGHTS FOR THE DAY.

So long as there are increases in taxation there must be increases in rent.—Mr. John Harrison.

However mean your life is meet it and live it; do not shun it and call it hard names.—Thoreau.

Be charitable before wealth makes thee covetous, and lose not the glory of the mite.—Sir Thomas Brown.

When a man has got good reason for doing a thing he has a very good reason for letting it alone.—Scott.

Politeness has indeed about it something mystical; like religion, it is everywhere understood and nowhere defined.—Chesterton.

The comfort which pour human beings want in such a world as this is not the comfort of ease but the comfort of strength.—Ringsley.

The people who speak good English are those who have always spoken good English, and have not learned it in after-life—Prof. Wyld.

When a Woman Suffers With Chronic Backache

There is Trouble Ahead.

Constantly on their feet, attending to the wants of a large and exacting family, women often break down with nervous exhaustion.

In the stores, factories, and on a farm are weak, ailing women, dragged down with torturing backache and bearing down pains.

Such suffering isn't natural, but it's dangerous, because due to diseased kidneys.

The dizziness, insomnia, deranged menses and other symptoms of kidney complaint can't cure themselves, they require the assistance of Dr. Hamilton's Pills which go direct to the seat of the trouble.

To give vitality and power to the kidneys, to lend aid to the bladder and liver, to free the blood of poisons, probably there is no remedy so successful as Dr. Hamilton's Pills. For all womanly irregularities their merit is well known.

Because of their mild, soothing, and healing effect, Dr. Hamilton's Pills are safe, and are recommended for girls and women of all ages. 25 cents per box at all dealers. Refuse any substitute for Dr. Hamilton's Pills of Mandrake and Butternut.

Hints to Husbands and Wives.

Common, ordinary sense is as essential to a happy marriage as flour is to bread.

To Husbands.

When your wife is becomingly gowned, tell her so.

When she waits dinner until late for you, act pleased.

Call her this "dear" once in a while that you worked overtime before she took your name.

Don't demonstrate your affection as if from force of habit. Some men kiss their wives in the same manner that they glance at the clock before leaving for work.

Don't read the newspaper at the breakfast table.

Go into your own kitchen once in a while. Wash and wipe the dishes or scour the frying pan. Laugh while you are doing it.

Develop a sense of humor.

Don't complain about your wife's cooking, for when a man marries a woman he does not always marry a cook.

To Wives.

Don't permit yourself to get too stout.

Don't be cross when he is late for supper or when he returns late at night. Don't subject him to the third degree.

Don't burden all the household troubles on him.

Don't be backward in waiting upon him. Play and sing for him evenings whether his favorites be "Annie Laurie" or not. If you can't sing, learn to read aloud.

Have his slippers and easy chair ready for him, and if the telephone or doorbell rings while he is reading, don't complain but answer it. —Selected.

The Connection Plan.

Brown—What a rig that woman has on.

Jones (looking)—By Jove, that reminds me I've got to get some castor oil for——

Brown—Eh! I fail to see how that rig can remind you of castor oil.

Jones—The bad taste of it, my boy.

Anger is the thunder that sours the milk of human kindness.

Doing Wonders For Rheumatism

WHAT PETER F. PATTERSON SAYS OF DODD'S KIDNEY PILLS.

Gaspe County Man Gives Advice to All Who Want to be Cured of Kidney Troubles.

Haldimand, Gaspe Co., Quebec, April 12 (Special).—"I have just opened the third box of Dodd's Kidney Pills, and find they are doing me wonders of good for the Kidneys and Rheumatism," so says Mr. Peter F. Patterson, a well known resident of this place.

"My troubles came through a cold and strain," Mr. Patterson continues, "and I suffered for many years. I had headache, backache and rheumatism. My sleep was broken and unrefreshing. I had a bitter taste in my mouth in the morning and I perspired freely with the slightest exertion. I was often dizzy; I was troubled with heart flutterings; I was nervous and my skin itched and burned at night.

"After using Dodd's Kidney Pills I recommend them to everyone who wants to be cured."

Everyone of Mr. Patterson's ailments was a symptom of Kidney disease. That's why he found such prompt relief in Dodd's Kidney Pills. They only cure Kidney disease.

What Corn to Grow.

An investigation conducted by the Seed Branch shows that about sixty so-called varieties of corn are grown for ensilage in Ontario and Quebec, and many farmers do not know what variety they are planting. Late varieties are being used in districts where they will not mature one year in five to the glazing of the grain, which is the necessary condition to make sweet ensilage. Some ordinary feed corn imported from the Central and Southern States is often served. Most of this is of a late variety entirely unsuited to Canadian conditions and is often injured by heating.

The following recommended varieties of corn are arranged in order of their maturity: Quebec Yellow, Longfellow, Sandford or North Dakota, Compton's Early, Golden Glow, Early White Cap, Wisconsin No. 7. In selecting varieties for our Northern districts, later-maturing, heavier-yielding varieties may be planted on a warm sandy soil than on a cold clayey one. The proper maturing is essential to high quality ensilage, and this should be aimed at even although an increased acreage is needed to give the desired quantity.

There are now living in cities many men with fair-sized families who have had experience in truck farming and who are paying as much as $200 per year rental for a house and small lot. An equally good home with 20 acres of land suitable for truck farming might be had in the country at lower rental and be quite capable of yielding even larger net returns for the family than would the city occupations.—Seed Branch, Ottawa.

Cure Children's Colds By External Treatment

Mothers Will Find Nothing so Speedily and Reliable as Old-Time "Nerviline."

It's really a shame to upset a young child's stomach by internal dosing, when external treatment will so promptly break up a cold.

When your boy comes in after play with his feet soaking wet, his throat hoarse and sore, his little chest tight and congested, just apply Nerviline, give him a vigorous rubbing over his throat, and put lots of Nerviline on his chest and rub it right in. To make Nerviline penetrate more quickly cover his chest and throat with a hot flannel, bandage. This treatment WON'T fail. Your boy will be feeling better in half an hour, and you will have the satisfaction of knowing you have warded off perhaps a cold, or grippe, or illness that might have laid him up.

Nerviline is mighty good for preventing colds and for breaking up a bad one, too. Every general family use it cures all sorts of external aches and pains—you simply can't beat it. Try it for earache, toothache, neuralgia, sciatica, lame back, rheumatism, or lumbago. Wherever there is congestion, inflammation or pain in the joints or muscles, Nerviline will cure mighty quick. The large 50c. family size bottle is so economical, so useful, it should be in every home. There is also a small 25c. size. Dealers anywhere sell Nerviline.

Raising Heifer Calves.

The records of two herds of dairy cows owned by two neighbors furnish a striking example of the utility of dairy records to the man who really wants to build up a good herd. The first man has been cow testing for four years and has selected his cows carefully, studying their various preferences and capacities, each one as an individual. He raises heifers from his best cows; four two-year-olds gave last year an average of 7,144 pounds of milk, while his herd of ten gave an average of 8,069 pounds of milk and 295 pounds of fat.

The neighbor considers it simpler to buy just what cows he can, he does not raise any calves. Last year his nine cows, all upwards of six years old, except two heifers, gave an average of only 2,240 pounds of milk. This is only just about one-half as much milk per cow as in the first herd. The best cow gave only 6,355 pounds, less than the average of the four heifers in the first herd. He has nothing on which to start building up a good dairy herd, unless it be his judgment in "picking a winner," which judgment, by the way, does not appear to be of A1 quality. The owner of the first herd has the advantage of four years of dairy records, practically indispensable to the real dairy farmer, besides matured judgment in handling cows to better advantage. Cow testing pays.—C.F.W.

The Borrower.

The borrower, at the 'phone: "Is this you, Miller? Yes, pretty well. Say, Miller, I've got half a dozen books of yours that you let me take last spring. I wish you'd stop for them as you go by. And, say, Miller, I want you to bring over your set of Plutarch and that early edition of Perrys and your French dictionary. If I'm not at home, you can leave them with the maid. Yes, that's all. Good-by."

INFORMATION FOR INVENTORS

Messrs. Pigeon, Pigeon & Davis, the patent solicitors of 71a St. James St., Montreal, report that for the week ending March 9th, 1915, 138 Canadian patents were issued, 101 of which were granted to Americans, 23 to Canadians and 14 to residents of foreign countries.

Of the Canadians who received patents, 11 were residents of Ontario, 3 of Alberta, 2 of Quebec, 2 of British Columbia, 2 of Manitoba, 1 of Saskatchewan, 1 of New Brunswick and 1 of Nova Scotia.

In the United States for the same week, 834 patents were issued, 15 of which were granted to Canadian inventors.

The Afterthought Sale.

"Every time I see grandfather's sword and medals," said Bill, "I long to take part in a universal war." Then, as an afterthought, Bill said, "but every time I look at grandfather's wooden leg I long for the advent of universal peace."

I consider MINARD'S LINIMENT the BEST Liniment in use.

The Scotch minister rose and cleared his throat, but remained silent, while the congregation awaited the sermon in puzzled expectancy, says The Ladies' Home Journal. At last he spoke: "There's a laddie awa' there in the gallery a-kissin' a lassie," he said. "When he's done ah'll begin."

Minard's Liniment Cures Dandruff.

A Strange Rock Dweller.

One of the strangest creatures known to science is the pholas, or boring clam. When still very minute the animal bores into the sandstone ledges at extreme low water, by means of its sharp shell, which is replaced by secretions as it is worn away. It penetrates the rock to a depth of six or eight inches, and hollows out its burrow as it increases in size. Shaped roughly like a top, it could not leave its rock dwelling for food even if it wished to do so. For food, it depends on the animalcules that float in sea water, which it seizes by its long siphon, or tongue. The pholas is in great demand at the seaside resorts along the Pacific coast, for its meat is very tender, and makes excellent soup. The clams are dislodged in great numbers from the ledges by the use of dynamite, although it is possible to obtain them with a pick or crowbar.

BABY'S OWN TABLETS USED ELEVEN YEARS

Mrs. McEachern, Glencoe, Ont., writes: "I have used Baby's Own Tablets for the past eleven years for my children and have every reason to praise them as they always do good." Causes of Soft Pork.

Soft pork, unsuited to the production of a high quality of bacon, is due to unthriftiness and lack of exercise. Imperfect feeding, marketing before finished, held too long after finish, and undue forcing are causes. Feeding too much corn to young pigs is objectionable. Wheat and rye middlings are unsatisfactory, and beans, soy-beans, produce a soft, oily pork. Barley ranks first in producing the best grade of bacon, skim milk and whey with cereal grains, including corn, make a solid flesh particularly desirable. Rape, roots and clover are helpful, but must be judiciously used. Exercise favors firmness of flesh. Pigs properly fed, with exercise, up to 100 lbs., if in this condition may be finished on almost any of the common meal mixtures, and produce fine bacon. Feed slightly less than a full ration. A little corn can be used at all times, and a very considerable amount when finished, if combined with dairy by-products and barley, oats and peas.

ARRAN COUNCIL

Council met April 9th; all present.

Messrs Neil McDougall and Wm Pound interviewed the council in regard to grant to agricultural society. $75 was granted.

The name of Wm Barclay was substituted for that of Robt Speer as pathmaster for road division 30.

Treasurer's statement showed balance in bank and on hand to be $2096.63. An account was presented from John Hewitson of $18.60 for wire fencing. Council had no knowledge of any such contract having been let and declined to consider the matter.

The reeve was instructed to write the Mimico Cement Co in regard to culvert pipes, &c., &c., etc.

Alex Crawford asked to be allowed to cut some trees on the highway.—Not entertained.

The matter of Building Pound's bridge was taken up, and after discussion A J Morrow moved that owing to the heavy war tax the building of Pound's bridge be laid over until next year. This failed to get a seconder. It was moved by Scarrow and McFadden that we proceed to build Pound's bridge.—Carried.

McFadden and Johnston moved that the reeve and Councillors Morrow and Scarrow be a committee to have Pound's bridge built forthwith, and that tenders be asked for both steel and cement.—Carried.

Resolution was passed endorsing the report of the Hydro Electric R. R. Association.

Orders were issued to the amount of $9 and council adjourned to meet as a Court of Revision on the 25th day of May next, and for general business.

WOMEN WHO ARE ALWAYS TIRED

May Find Help in This Letter.

Swan Creek, Mich.—"I cannot speak too highly of your medicine. When through neglect or overwork I get run down and my appetite is poor and I have that weak, languid, always tired feeling, I get a bottle of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and it builds me up, gives me strength, and restores me to perfect health again. It is truly a great blessing to women, and I cannot speak too highly of it. I take pleasure in recommending it to others."—Mrs. ANNIE CAMERON, R.F.D., No. 3, Swan Creek, Michigan.

Another Sufferer Relieved.

Hebron, Me.—"Before taking your remedies I was all run down, discouraged and had female weakness. I took Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and used the Sanative Wash, and find today that I am an entirely new woman, ready and willing to do my housework now, where before taking your medicine it was a dread. I try to impress upon the minds of all ailing women I meet the benefits they can derive from your medicines."—Mrs. CHARLES ROWE, R. F. D., No. 1, Hebron, Maine.

If you want special advice write to Lydia E. Pinkham Medicine Co., (confidential) Lynn, Mass. Your letter will be opened, read and answered by a woman and held in strict confidence.

We are pleased to see Miss Tena Schmidt able to be around again after her illness.

Death has again appeared in our midst and claimed for its tribute one of our oldest pioneers, in the person of Mrs Finlay Hood, who for 60 years had lived continuously in this township. The deceased lady, whose maiden name was Jane McKay, was born in Zorra township, Oxford Co, on Oct 22nd, 1834. When 14 years of age, her father, Mr Hector McKay, moved to Kincardine tp boundary about a mile west of Tiverton, where she lived until she married Mr Alex Gunn. Coming to Underwood they took up housekeeping on a bush lot over 60 years ago. After a little over four years of happy married life the husband came to an untimely death by a tree falling upon him. Returning to her father's home with her young family she lived there for nine years when she married Mr Finlay Hood. After living on Mr Hood's farm on the 6th until some 13 years ago they retired to Underwood where Mr Hood died nine years ago. Mrs Hood was a woman of sterling character, much esteemed and respected by all who knew her. She was a member of the Presbyterian Church, the Presbyterian Ladies' Aid Society and the Missionary Society. She leaves to mourn her four sons, Alex Gunn, in Vancouver; Finlay Hood, in Ottawa; Geo H Hood, at home, and John A Hood, in Bellingham, Wash; also three brothers, Angus and John in Tiverton, and James on the 10th of Kincardine. The funeral on Wednesday was largely attended, her pastor, Rev Mr McNab, conducting the services in the Presbyterian Church and at the graveside.

— BUTTER PAPER—real vegetable parchment, not a cheaper imitation—printed and sold at The Advocate Office at lowest possible prices. We can print 500 sheets or more with your name on, and for the convenience of those who do not require that quantity, we keep printed wrappers on hand without any name on and sell this in quantities of 100 sheets or over.

ROBB—GAMMIE

"Maple Crest Farm," 4th con Arran, the home of Mr Andrew Gammie, was the scene of a festive occasion on Wednesday, April 9th, when his daughter, Margaret Jane, was united in marriage to Mr Alexander Robb, of Williscroft. The ceremony was performed at 4.30 o'clock by Rev W J Watt of Burgoyne, in the presence of about seventy five invited guests, most of whom were relatives or immediate friends of the bride and groom. The bride looked charming, wearing a bridal wreath, and dressed in white satin with an overdress of embroidered net, and carried a large bouquet of white roses. Miss Robb, sister of the groom, whose dress was of embroidered voile, presided at the organ, and played the wedding march. The groom's gift to the bride was a beautiful jewelled pendant, and to the organist a ring. Immediately after the ceremony photos were taken of the bridal couple beneath the beautiful white wedding arch, and also of the invited guests assembled out on the lawn. Adjournment was then made to the dining room where a sumptuous repast was served. The popularity of both bride and groom was shown by the very many beautiful and useful presents received, and also by the number of guests from a distance who responded to their invitation to be present at the marriage, the following places being among those thus represented: Gorrie, Ethel, Fordwich, Harriston and Chesley. The heartiest good wishes of the whole district go with the young couple to their new home at Williscroft.

WALKERTON

The Ontario Government has purchased a new five passenger Ford touring car for use at the Walkerton branch of the Department of Agriculture, and the manager, Mr N C McKay, is now busy learning to run the machine. This will be quite an assistance to the Agricultural experts here, and will enable them to cover the county more rapidly in the execution of their work.

Provincial Health Inspector McNally's visit to Walkerton on Monday last resulted in a peremptory order being issued to the council to compel the removal of all the slaughter houses here to a point beyond the town limits. As a result the council held a special session on Tuesday to banish all the slaughter houses from Walkerton, and the butchers were given until June 1st to rid the town of three killing pens. The ordinance will no doubt be a costly one to the local meat shops, but it is claimed that in the interests of the public health such steps are necessary.

Mr John Purvis, the well-known auctioneer, is being freely spoken of as the probable Conservative candidate to contest South Bruce at the next Dominion election, which is expected will be held about June 14th. While no doubt many other desirable names will be brought before the convention at Formosa on the 29th, yet it is probable that the nomination will go to Mr Purvis, who is very popular throughout the riding, and should be able to reclaim South Bruce for the Conservatives.

Mr Chas Bleiham, who for the past thirty-five years has farmed on the 7th con Brant died on Friday last, aged 81 years and 8 months. The deceased was a native of Germany and lived in the United States before coming to Ont. His son William and daughter, Mrs John Mortimer, reside in Brant, while two other sons reside in Missouri. The funeral took place to the Lutheran cemetery, Brant, on Monday.—Herald and Times.

BRANT COUNCIL

The municipal council of the township of Brant met in the township hall on Monday, the 5th day of April. Members all present, minutes of last meeting read and declared correct.

Rowand—Manto—That petitions having been presented requesting to have lots 10 to 14 inclusive, con A, changed from polling subdivision No 1 to polling subdivision No 4, and to have lots 20 and 21, con 10 and 11, changed from polling subdivision No 6 to polling subdivision No 7, the prayers of the petitioners be granted, and that the clerk prepare a by-law confirming this resolution.—Carried.

Rowand—Willoughby—That By-law No 70, A D 1915, be altered by appointing the following named persons pathmasters instead of those who are unable to act: Harry Chrispin, Fred Hannock, Jas Calnon, Wm Norton, Thos Carder, Fred Engel.—Carried.

Findlay—Willoughby—That this council grant Mrs Henry Richardson the sum of $10 as assistance in destitution on recommendation of Dr Murray of Cargill.—Carried.

Willoughby—Findlay—That this council purchase a road grader and also two road drags for use in township and the reeve and councillor Rowand be empowered to purchase same.—Carried.

Rowand—Manto—That the Reeve and Clerk issue orders on the Treasurer for all accounts passed at this meeting.—Carried.

Willoughby—Findlay—That this council do now adjourn to meet on Tuesday, the 25th of May as a Court of Revision and for other general business. Court of Revision commencing at 1 o'clock p.m.—Carried.

M A McCALLUM, Clerk.

Heard Enough

"Where is Tommy?" asked Mr Jones on his return from business one evening. "Gone to bed," was his wife's reply. "I hope he's not ill?" "No, I sent him to bed as a punishment for swearing." "Swearing!" repeated Mr Jones. "I'll teach him to swear." Without waiting for a light the angry father rushed upstairs to interview the culprit, only to fall over a loose stair-rail and bump his chin. At once he became exceedingly fluent, and when the air had cleared he heard his wife call gently: "Better come down, dear. I'm sure Tommy has heard enough for his first lesson."

—Queen St. has become very presentable as a thoroughfare since the spring clean-up of loose mud and slush. Now it is up to every citizen to give his premises a brush-up that will harmonize with the municipal effort. The town hall and waterworks surroundings will also bear attention, as for several regimes back there have been dirty spots accumulating. The 1915 council might see that it doesn't get past them.

—The big plate glass window in McArthur's bookstore front was shattered on Thursday last by a baseball thrown by one of the continuation school pupils who were engaged in a game of catch on the street after school hours. This will be an expensive throw and miss, but it is likely the boys will all chip in to help pay for the plate glass. When the new school is finally ready the boys will be relieved of any financial hazards such as this, the enlarged grounds affording ample scope for ball games of any kind.

—Every up-to-date 20th century farmer should have his name and address neatly printed on his envelopes and writing paper, also the name of his farm, especially since the rural delivery has been established. It not only looks business-like, but prevents correspondence from going astray. In the event of the non-delivery of a letter, from whatever cause, it will be certain to return to the sender if his name and address appears on the upper left-hand corner of the envelope. THE ADVOCATE can furnish farmers with printed envelopes or writing paper at small cost.

—The Oddfellows' "At Home" in Abram Lodge Hall on Wednesday evening was a very successful and enjoyable affair to all who were present. Nearly all local knights of the three links were there with their lady friends. The most interesting feature of the evening's proceedings was the marching of the degree team in full paraphernalia. The new outfit of robes recently purchased are the most gorgeous and nifty yet worn by any I.O.O.F. team in this section of country, and although the styles are about 4000 years out of date, the brilliant hues, rich lustre and quaint forms made a very attractive picture to the modern devotees of fashion. An entertaining programme was also rendered, under the direction of Dr. Houston, N.O., the items comprising solos by Misses Annetta Johnston and May Warren, Messrs. L. R. Putnam and D. McKenzie, an address on wit and humor by Dr. Black, a selection by the male quartette, and music by the orchestra. After lunch had been served, the hall was cleared and dancing enjoyed.

G. B. IRWIN

"The Up-to-Date Tailor"

The Darkest Hour;

Or, The Hope That Still Lived.

CHAPTER XIX.—(Continued).

The support of his elbow failed him, and he sank back on his coarse and dirty pallow with a low moan. But his hand had not relaxed its hold on her wrist. He had drawn her arm down, so that she had to lean close over him.

"She's got them all under her thumb for something of other that they've done," he went on, more faintly now, but doesn't employ them else. There's not one of her agents and spies, either man or women, that she couldn't put into prison if she wanted to. That makes them serve her unanimously. She could get a good many months hard labor for theft, if she liked. I stole jewels for her once."

"Ronald!" The name came as a cry from the pale lips of Christine.

He smiled bitterly.

"She didn't want to wear them, nor yet exactly to make money out of them. She only invented a cruel scandal about them, and won a great deal of financial support as the price of their ransom. So you see drawing back from me? His failing voice trembled. "You see I was right enough when I said that the sooner my people believed me to be dead the better. Then even you will soon be able to lay to your soul the comfort that I am dead. It's horrible thoughts me dying—and dying so young. But I'm afraid all the same, afraid of that punishment which they say is to come afterwards.

"It's not for my sins against the worlds ends it I'm afraid of it. I'm afraid on account of the harm I've done to others. In this womanly service I've been a decoy as well as a spy. I've dragged down other souls—the souls of men and even of women who had kept themselves, from sin and crime until they met me. I've inveigled them into wrong-doing in order that through wrongdoing the name of Mrs. Crookenden, who today stands for Mammon in the Christian country, might have them under her thumb and bend them to her will. The latest of these victims is the man I want you to save, a young bank clerk, by name Harry Lewisham. Under her orders I investigated his affairs. He lost so much at [illegible] that he had to choose between embezzlement and immediate open ruin. He would have chosen the open ruin but for my fascination. Glad if he emphasised the meanness of the bank he could [illegible] the whole but ever the next bets he made. And this enabled me able to put back all that he had stolen without anybody knowing anything of the unpleasant little affair. He listened to my persuasions, and did embezzle, and, of course, instead of winning over the next bets he lost more and more, and was in an awful state, standing face to face with ruin and penal servitude until I took him to her Mrs. Crookenden, and she saved him—saved him by giving him the money to embezzle.

He stopped, for his breath was coming with difficulty. A change that alarmed the watching girl was coming over his face. During the last few months she had learned to know the look that heralds the approach of death. She tried to speak, but her voice failed her; her throat and her tongue felt parched. The grip of his hand on her wrist was failing.

"I want you to go and find out that man —he's very young, only the other day I saw him—and warn him. Here in her grip now. She's got all the evidence about the embezzlement, and she holds it over him under the threat of using it. He will weaken at the worst she can give him to do, but he doesn't refuse to do it. When I think of him now and realise my share in it, undoing I feel that I am a wretched God can't hate mercy upon me. But if you go to Lewisham and save him, that may count a little for me when the time comes for me to be judged. I want you to go to him and tell him—after all it's folly to think that the exposure of his felony and the punishment of the law will be worse for him than the work he's doing now. Tell him to defy her and risk everything. Tell him that a man may commit a crime and get penal servitude for it, and come out again an honest man, and that God will see to it that things shall not be too hard for him afterwards. Tell him that justification for him can only be found in that way. It's better to be hunted openly for a felon than to do dirty work in secret, with self contempt, poisoning every hour of life. Tell him I said this in my dying hour."

The change on her face had become so marked and so sig... that Christine rose suddenly to her feet and rushed to the door to call for help. Yet who was there in the stretched house that could help her? She stood irresolute, when a feeble voice from the bed called her back.

"You will find the address in my coat pocket. The coat is there, at the foot of the bed. A queer-looking coat, isn't it, for Ronald Dore, who was one of the dandies at Eton and Cambridge?"

He tried to laugh, but couldn't. Then he stretched out one of his trembling hands to beckon her to come closer.

But when she did come closer, he did not know it. Nothing that she did could ever be known to him again. And another part of an injured woman's great revenge had been accomplished.

CHAPTER XX.

"You sent for me?"

It was the young bank clerk, Harry Lewisham, who spoke, standing alone in the presence of Mrs Crookenden in her private room in Lombard Street. The woman financier was on the farther side of her writing-table, while he stood close to the near... side. Only a few feet divided them, and yet no thrill of the tie of blood which, unknown and, supposed, existed between them was felt by either son or mother. The mother was in those moments purely and simply a woman of business. She had summoned the young man to her to give him orders concerning a certain matter, a piece of work which required him to undertake for her; while he on his turn stood in a deferential and attentive attitude before her, ready to do her bidding because she had been his redeemer from ruin, and he owed her gratitude and obedience, and yet praying in his soul that the business which she was about to impose upon him might be of a less dishonorable nature than some which she had compelled him to do for her lately. But in this prayer he was doomed to be disappointed.

"Well my good Harry," she was beginning, after intimating by means of an assenting nod that she had in every deed sent for him. "I've another little job for you. It is of a nature to require the sharpness of mind and delicacy of handling which you have shown yourself capable of devoting to such affairs. You must get a week's holiday from the bank. I will see to that if you find it difficult to continue—and during that week you must apply for and obtain the post."

She handed him a letter as she spoke, signing to him to read it. He read it, and found that it was signed "Yoxford," and that it contained, among the good deal of other matter, the following sentence:—

"I understand you to say that you know of a thoroughly good and dependable secretary who could come to me immediately upon Tate's leaving me. Tate leaves next week, and I should consequently be glad if you could send me the address of the young fellow whom you recommend, or cause him to be informed that it would be convenient if he could come down here and see me some day this week—say, Friday. The salary is a hundred and fifty a year; I might give more at the end of a few months to a secretary who should prove himself thoroughly capable and trustworthy, and who suited me in every way."

"You must go down at once as I apply for that post," Mrs. Crookenden informed the young clerk when he handed her back the letter. "You know the Earl of Yoxford since not day from Guildford?"

Young Harry Lewisham nodded, but still looked puzzled.

"Do you mean that I'm to give up my work at the bank and take the secretaryship instead?" he asked in a perplexed tone.

Mrs. Crookenden looked at him impatiently.

"No, of course not. Did I not say that you were only to ask for a week's holiday from the bank? What I want you to do is to get this as secretary and live in the house for a week, during which time the confidential nature of your employment will enable you to obtain for me certain private papers which I have reason to know are locked up in a certain despatch box in Lord Yoxford's private room, and which it is absolutely necessary that I should get into my hands for business purposes. Do you understand me now?"

The boyish and still honest face of the young clerk had become a pale mask.

"You," he stuttered slowly, in a voice that had nervousness and pain in it. As he spoke he unconsciously moved back a few steps, going farther from her and nearer to the door. "I understand—but—but if you could spare me, I would far rather not undertake this mission. It is very difficult and—and it is not honest."

Anger blazed in the eyes of the great woman—socially and financially—which he had ventured to defy.

"I advise you to be careful how you speak to me, she warned him coldly. And then she laughed a short, harsh laugh of contemptuous amusement. "You are hardly a person to be squeamish and to talk of honesty," she went on. "I would be better for you to leave that sort of talk to people who do not stand altogether in being hailed before the magistrate for felony. You have to understand—this moment, you call it honest to accept the post or not honest to accept it. If you object very much to this kind of work, why, then, the remedy is in your own hands. You can go back to it the very day you like, and be kept there safely out of the way of further harm. You shrink from that? Very well, then, you must do whatever I give you to do unmurmuringly. Come to me here again in two hours' time for further instructions. Meanwhile I will write to Lord Yoxford, and tell him that you will come down to-morrow at twelve o'clock."

So the mother unknowingly sent her son the best and most dangerous enemy of all creatures in the world, her husband and lonely heart still cherished tender memories of a despicable husband, her pending who could not forever. Christine Dare might save him if she should meet him in time. But would she do this?

CHAPTER XXI.

What ought I to do? What ought I to do? The young bank clerk, known to himself and his small world as the orphaned and friendless Harry Lewisham, but known to the secret eye of God as one who had both father and mother living, and who bore by right of birth a more honorable name, was walking homeward after his interview with Mrs. Crookenden in her Lombard Street office.

"What ought I to do? Where does my PIMLICO path lie? he repeated to himself over and over again. His walk was a little less steady than it should have been, for the flushed young face was pale, and his eyes looked wearied, seeing at little of where his feet were going. But many a passer of the agitated person, who must by stopped short and stood staring after him as he strode hurriedly along, and one or two of them decided in their own minds that he had had more beer or possibly wine than was good for him. But these casual critics would have been still more surprised if they had witnessed the inner struggle that was going on within his breast; the struggle which, inward turned, had made it so forgetful that he was in a crowded street, forgetful of everything except the strange and desperate temptation into which by sheer fatality he had just himself.

He had just placed him at the dividing point of two cross-roads, each of which led to ruin; either he must yield himself up to the hands of the Law, and for the sake of the public and irrevocable disgrace accompanying that penalty, for a felony of which he would be only in a way to prove himself guilty, or else he must purchase his public safety and the continuance of his private good name at the price of devoting in secret and jobs of so infamous a nature that the doing of them seemed to him to be a thousand times worse than the first crime of embezzlement. Driven by despair, a man might in a weak and evil hour take the money of others in order to shield himself from great trouble, and might afterwards forget and live honestly, and, with God's help, once more a man in almost the full sense of the word. But a man who played the spy, the decoy, and even went to the length of throwing in secret and for evil purposes could such a man ever be, or ever hope to be, but a pariah and an outcast, at once loathing and despised of all men and women of honor?

Should he do it this piece of work that a merciless woman had set him? It was true that in the beginning he had almost worshipped the woman, and had felt his heart overflowing with gratitude to her for using he power to save him from ruin. Never once had he suspected that she herself had set about his feet the snares of the temptation which had brought about that ruin. He had felt that even if he desired to her the labor of his whole lifetime it would hardly be enough to pay the debt he owed her.

"I will wear myself out with work for her and if you will only let me," he had cried to her more than once out of his full heart. And this he had meant to do with all the strength of his young manhood. But he had not dreamed then of the manner of work she would allot to him. When he had demonstrated that he had shrunk back, revolted. His face had told her sufficiently of the inward revolt, and then she had only laughed answeringly and contemptuously. Dared he defy her openly? More than once during the hour which had passed since his last interview with her he had realised that he would do so; but as often as he had made this resolve, so often had he unmade it, convinced and appalled before the thought of the contention and imprisonment for felony which would follow such defiance. Often enough had he heard it said about London that the enemies of Mrs. Crookenden never prospered. Could he afford to make himself one of those of unhappy numbers?

The rich woman's parting words to him just now had been a sneer. "I do not see why you should be so particular and so full of scruples about the business she had said sarcastically. "You were not born a gentleman."

And he had not known enough to reply to her that he was her son and the son of the great man whom she had once called her husband before she had cast him off and called him her husband in secret bitterness. So had he left her presence—way out of her presence without making her any answer other than a murmured assurance that he would try, this time as other times, to do her bidding. Beggars cannot be choosers," she had said to him a hundred times, and now he saw that if ever there was a beggar who could not afford to choose, he was one.

When he reached the lodging that he called his home—a poor lodging enough in a squalid street near Kings Cross, but brightened lately by a few costly odds and ends which Mrs Crookenden had sent him by way of additional reward for his services—he was told that a young lady had called and asked to see him about half an hour before. Upon being told that he was not at home, and that he had left no information as to the time at which he was likely to return, the young lady had seemed to be greatly disappointed. She had gone away, leaving a message to the effect that she would call again on the following day. What was she like? Oh, very young and very handsome; she was very fair, with grey eyes—the landlady had evidently taken the visitor closely—and she looked ill, and wore deep mourning. She had left her card, and from the card according to the landlady's own words, she "belonged to the Her ate-crazy."

The unhappy young clerk took up the card from the setting-room table and looked at it. He looked carelessly at first, too much absorbed in his own great trouble to take much interest in the fact that a casual stranger had called to see him. But a look of surprise showed itself on his pale, haggard face as he read the name printed on the smooth pasteboard surface. "Lady Dare" was the first name, and be neath it was "Miss Dare." The mother's name had a stroke of the pen through it, indicating that the daughter had called alone. In the left hand corner of the card was the address "The Uplands, near Guildford, Surrey."

"After all, I dare say she is only one of Mrs. Crookenden's friends, come here on some more of this spying work," he said to himself with bitter conviction. "It is not possible that any one could want to see me for my own sake. A poor, friendless clerk can hardly expect to be visited by people of the sort for any other reason than that of hiring his services. Well, who ever this Miss Dare may be, and whatever she may want, she will hardly find me here when she comes again to-morrow."

Sitting down at the table, he drew towards him the inkstand which was upon it, and finding a pen and paper, began duly to write out the application for the necessary week's holiday on the false plea of ill health. He had no doubt about the application's answer. His employer later would more than sufficiently assure that the week's holiday should be granted him. When he had finished writing the letter and had posted it, he began to look out his clothes, preparatory to undertaking the next day's journey down to Guildford, thence to make his way to the town county seat of the Earl of Yoxford, and to appear before his landship as the thoroughly capable and trustworthy young secretary whom the great Mrs. Crookenden had so warmly recommended.

Barbed Wire in War.

Barbed wire was invented by a farmer fifty years ago for the harmless purpose of preventing cattle from breaking their way through fences. He did not imagine that later his discovery would be taken up by every army in Europe. Yet such has proved the case, and barbed wire is to-day as necessary a part of an army's equipment as pontoons or trenching tools. In war barbed wire is used in various ways, but its main object is man-stopping. It is interlaced with ground pegs in front of trenches for the purpose of tripping charging troops; it is strung across bridges and main roads to prevent the passage of cavalry, and it is used for fencing in open ups to guard against rushing tactics on the part of the enemy.

Whenever possible barbed wire entanglements are hidden in long grass or in hedges, so that advancing troops will be trapped while the enemy rake their lines with shot and shell. Barbed wire concealed in undergrowth is particularly deadly where cavalry is concerned, for the wire grips the horses' hoofs, causing them to fall on the spike-strewn ground.

At times certain roads that it is desirable to have passable to towns people, have to be rendered impassable to the enemy. To accomplish this zigzag fences of barbed wire are built from one side of the road to the other until they form a maze. A peasant with time to spare can pass this barrier by laboriously threading his way through the narrow zigzag passages left open, but a detachment of several hundred men, but a detachment of several hundred men, especially if they have guns or are mounted, must halt to destroy the entanglement.

The barbed wire used for military purposes possesses long, jagged points, which inflict most terrible wounds, especially when men and horses fall on to them headlong, as so often happens.

Growling seems to afford a lot of comfort to some men, but it is an abomination to the rest of the public.

EDUCATION COMING TO THE FARMER.

New Life Has Come Into the Old Counties of Ontario—Agricultural Education is More than a Name Now.

Away back in pioneer days the leaders in affairs, educational, laid the foundation of our public school system. The first schools weren't very ornate, and the teachers had little training, judged by the present standard of qualifications. The three R's were considered to be quite sufficient—mental decoration wasn't at a premium—but the pupils were taught obedience and thoroughness, and many of our greatest men arose from those little obscure backwoods schools.

As villages grew into towns and towns into cities, the ambition of educational leaders grew with them, however. Teachers became better qualified, new subjects were added, and higher institutions were established until the present complicated and complex system was evolved. And the citizens, generally, were very pleased there-at, and prided themselves that they were wearing the latest in educational fashions.

Now, as the system developed a paradox developed with it. The average farmer, while respecting education and agreeing that it was a very attractive decoration to have when it wasn't too expensive, did not care to invest very heavily in it himself. A feeling that farming couldn't be learned from books grew so strongly that it became a trait of rural character. The system might have been at fault, but the educated preferred to blame the farmer himself for these conditions.

"Was there ever such a man!" they cried. "He is so bound to tradition and practice that he doesn't care for education. He will not develop the scientific viewpoint, nor will he allow his children to do so. The majority of those who stay on the farm never attend high school even. He is satisfied with the methods and knowledge that were possessed by his fathers before him."

An Idea That Fell Down.

But the farmer had his own views of these matters, and, like most of his views, they were the result of hard experience. He didn't always advocate them where everyone could hear them, but he realized none the less clearly certain things that his critics did not. We can imagine a shrewd, intelligent man addressing a lad fresh from school.

"My fine fellow, you have gone through a process of absorption and have acquired considerable mental trimming. You can talk more correctly than I, you are vaguely familiar with a quantity of historical dates and foreign phrases, you can write a graceful essay, you have some aptitude for figures; there are other things that you have that I know little about. So! are you practical? Can you tell me anything about the nature of earth or clouds that will be of practical value to me? What do you know about trees, plants and crops—what will make them thrive, or why they fail? Can you perform the operations of farming even as well as when you left for school? Can you do practical calculations? Have you a working knowledge of banking and of the world's business transactions? No! You have not! You were never shown these, only were told about some of them vaguely and some not at all, you say.

"Now, there is my son Henry. He has not had the schooling you have had. He did not even pass the high school entrance; but he was educated in the practical school of life. He is skilled in farm operations, is enthusiastic aggressive, quick in emergency, and strong in action. After all your education he has a better training in those things that make for successful farming than you have."

Of course, the farmer saw the question from only one angle. He didn't appreciate the joy of knowledge for the sake of knowledge, and his ideal may have been too much the money ideal. But he was not far astray about the practical value of the system. It fitted a few for professions, but fitted very poorly, or misfitted, a multitude for commercial or agricultural occupations. So, after all, the system was to blame rather than the farmer. His children wouldn't get much knowledge that would make them better farmers from the schools that had been the product of so much thought and expense.

And this was the situation before the people of the Province became impressed with the fact that agricultural training was necessary. For a long time after the Agricultural College was established at Guelph, very many were doubtful of the value of the course. Some are doubtful of its value still, but the majority of the farmers realize that it is a good thing. They know, of course, that the practice of farming must always be learned upon the farm; but they believe a good deal of theory can be blended to very great advantage with the practice. It all rests with the student himself as to whether he can return to the home farm and apply his knowledge in a sane and practical manner.

But, despite the value of the agricultural course, or rather because of it, the college has its limitations. It could not accommodate the young farmers of Ontario. It did good work, but in a very limited way. Each year less than 2,000 students, all told, attended the institution. So the problem became not how the farmer could go to the college, but how the college could go to the farmer.

The district representative scheme grew from this need. In 1907 six college graduates were sent into as many counties to act as agricultural advisers. For awhile the wisdom of the plan was questioned, as it is of every new thing. But it proved itself. To-day the number has increased to forty-one, and these men have gone to their stations at the request of the farmers themselves. So the problem of the college going to the farmer was partly solved.

It wasn't entirely solved, because one man in a county worked under a great handicap. He hadn't the time to reach a very large proportion of his constituents very intimately or personally. And in that the greatest value of the work lay. Unless he did it the college hadn't got to the farm after all, but only to the county.

This need led to the development of the Winter Short Course idea for young farmers. In 1908 the first course was given at Lindsay. It had an attendance of six pupils. In 1913 forty-three courses of from four to six weeks' duration were held with a total register after attendance of 1,075. The special attendance was far greater, one course in Glengarry county having an attendance of 100 at a special meeting. Nothing could illustrate the popularity of the scheme more than that, nor, by the same token, the value of it either, for what is popular with our farmers has usually a practical value.

The idea of the winter school was simply to give the farm lads a training in elementary agricultural science—to bring the work of the college to their very doors. Of the subjects taken up, live stock is usually featured. A brief review of the methods employed in treating this line will illustrate those of all others.

The history and characteristics of the various breeds of farm animals are considered, and a practical course in live stock judging is given. The farmers owning the best stock in the neighborhood in which the course is held are usually visited and the merits of their animals discussed. The boys are taught to look for the points considered by judges in the show ring. The value of different feeds and the principles of feeding balanced rations are explained. Methods of her improvement and stock management, the housing of animals and the construction of farm buildings are all considered as fully as the limited time permits.

That is how all other subjects are treated. These vary according to the district and the local requirements. At all classes an elementary study is given of farm crops, soils, fertilizers, underdrainage, fruit growing, poultry, bacteriology, farm organization and co-operation and farm bookkeeping.

The courses were held in the various districts at those centres deemed most satisfactory, the tendency being to favor the smaller villages. No fees nor books were required, and in the majority of cases no examinations were held. But, of course, at best, only a foundation can be given to be built upon. It is only a start. The value lies not so much in what is actually taught as in the ability it gives the student to study for himself and the impetus to strive for higher things. The association of a number of enthusiastic young fellows meeting for a common purpose is in itself a stimulation—an incentive to organization and interchange of ideas such as agriculture has long been in need of.

But the united work of the class does not cease with the termination of the course. The great object of it is for the boys to put the ideas formed at the course to the acid test of practice upon the home farm—to blend theory and practice in the way the best farmers in every neighborhood have been doing.—Justus Miller, in Canadian Countryman.

Still Has It.

"He has the first dollar he ever earned."

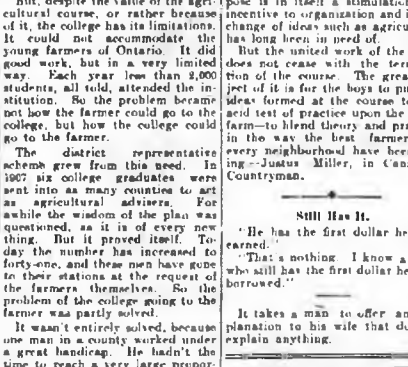
"That's nothing. I know a chap who still has the first dollar he ever borrowed."

It takes a man to offer an explanation to his wife that doesn't explain anything.

Delicious with Blanc Mange

Have you never tried "Crown Brand" with Blanc Mange and other Corn Starch Puddings? They seem to blend perfectly—each improves the other—together, they make simple, inexpensive desserts, that everyone says are "simply delicious".

EDWARDSBURG



"CROWN BRAND" CORN SYRUP

is ready to serve over all kinds of Puddings—makes a new and attractive dish of such an old favorite as Baked Apples—is far cheaper than butter or preserves when spread on bread—and is best for Candy-making.

"LILY WHITE" is a pure white Corn Syrup—more delicate in flavor than "Crown Brand". Perhaps you would prefer it.

Hints for the Home

Bread Recipes.

Hot Raised Biscuits.—When the bread dough is ready to put in the pans pinch enough biscuits off the dough and roll them in small balls. Lay them in rows in buttered pans, pricking the top of each with a fork, and let them rise to double their size. Put a little lump of butter between every two. Bake them twenty minutes.

Fried Bread.— When the bread dough is ready for the pans cut off a good sized piece, roll it out on a floured board and cut strips half an inch thick and four inches long. Roll them round between the hands and lay them on a floured board, allowing three to each member of the family and a few over. Let them rise until they puff up,—then have ready a kettle of hot lard and fry them to a delicate brown. Heap them on a platter in a napkin and serve with maple syrup or hot honey.

Rusks.—Take one pint of milk, one egg, three-quarters of a cup of sugar, one-half cup of butter, one-half teaspoon of salt and three-quarters of a compressed yeast cake dissolved in half a cup of cold water. Add flour enough to make a stiff batter that can be stirred with a spoon. Let it rise till light, then mould into small cakes. Lay the cakes in a well buttered pan and let them rise again and bake to a delicate brown. Brush over the top with a buttered cloth and sprinkle with powdered sugar. A cup of seeded raisins or currants may be added if desired.

Egg Puffs.— Mix one pound of sifted flour with one tablespoonful of baking powder, one teaspoon of salt and two tablespoons of sugar. Beat three eggs, add them to two tablespoons of melted butter, mix all together and add enough warm milk to make a moderately thin batter. Fill well-greased hot muffin tins half full and bake quickly.

Sally Lunn.—Take one pint of flour, two teaspoons of baking powder and half a teaspoon of salt. Beat two eggs, whites and yolks separately; add half a cup of sweet milk to the yolks, stir slowly into the flour, adding one-half cup of melted butter, beat thoroughly, then add last the beaten whites of the eggs. Bake in well buttered warm muffin pans, filling them two-thirds full; bake about twenty minutes.

Popovers.—Take one egg, beating white and yolk separately; one cup of sweet milk, one cup of flour and a pinch of salt. Beat all together, adding the white of the egg last. Bake twenty minutes in buttered muffin tins.

Corn Muffins.—Take one cup of yellow corn meal, one-half cup of flour, a tablespoon of sugar, one and a half teaspoons of baking powder, one beaten egg, one and a half cups of sweet milk and a generous pinch of salt. Bake in hot greased gem pans from twenty to thirty minutes.

Gluten Muffins.—Take two cups of gluten flour, two cups of milk, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one well beaten egg. Mix the dry ingredients, stir in the beaten eggs and milk, beat thoroughly together and half fill well-buttered gem pans. Bake twenty minutes.

Glen House Flannel Cakes.—Visitors to the White Mountains years ago who were fortunate enough to get the old Glen House recipe for flannel cakes still keep it among their family treasures, and as it is passed to younger generations it loses none of its fame. Put two ounces of butter into a pint of hot milk and let it melt, then add a pint of rich cold milk, four well-beaten eggs, a teaspoon of salt, a half yeast cake dissolved in half a cup of cold water and sufficient flour to make a stiff batter. Set it in a warm place three hours to rise; then fry the cakes on a hot greased griddle, and serve with hot maple syrup, fresh butter and whipped cream.

Fruit Muffins.—Take one pint of flour, a quarter teaspoonful of salt, two tablespoons of melted butter, a quarter cup of sugar, two small teaspoons of baking powder, one egg and one cup of milk. Mix thoroughly as for plain muffins and add last of all one cup of fresh berries, seeded raisins, or finely chopped preserved fruit, dusted with a little flour. Bake in well-greased muffin pans in a hot oven twenty minutes. See that the fruit is properly drained before being added. Blueberries will be found especially good in these muffins.

Useful Hints.

Boiled puddings should never be turned out the moment they are done. They are very likely to break if this is done.

If vegetables are overcooked their texture toughens, their flavor is somewhat destroyed, and they are not so digestible.

Don't forget to give your hair at least a hundred strokes with a brush morning and evening. Proper brushing does away with the necessity of too frequent washing.

Don't forget to bathe the neck and arms in a little milk the night before going to a dance. This is grandmother's remedy, which never fails to make the skin look smooth and white.

A smoky lamp is often the result of a clogged and dirty wick. Take the burner out of the lamp and soak it in a little strong washing soda and hot water, then dry thoroughly, and the lamp will burn much better.

To prevent new shoes from pinching lay a cloth moistened in hot water across the place where the pressure is most felt, changing the cloth as soon as it becomes cool. This will make the leather shape itself to the foot.

The economical housewife has a place for everything, and constantly endeavors to keep everything in its place. One of the little economies she delights in is saving the string which tie up the parcels she receives; also nothing will induce her to cut string; she always unties it, and then winds it into neat little bundles, which are put in a bag reserved for it, and which hangs in a convenient place. This string bag is a great comfort in a house, and saves much time and annoyance.

Steaming is one of the simplest and best ways of cooking potatoes. Prepare the potatoes as for boiling and cut them to an equal size. Put them into a steamer and sprinkle with salt. Place the steamer on the top of a saucepan of boiling water and put on the lid. Keep the water in the saucepan underneath the potatoes quickly boiling all the time. The time for cooking will depend on the size and kind of potatoes. When they can be pierced easily with a skewer, cover them with a clean cloth, remove the steamer from the water, and stand it in a warm place until the potatoes are dry and mealy. Ten minutes should be sufficient. Time to cook, 30 to 40 minutes.

NEW LICENSE BOARD.

Premier Hearst Announces Names of New Provincial Board of License Commissioners.

Toronto, April 19. — Premier Hearst has implemented his promise to give speedy consideration to the appointment of the new Provincial Board of License Commissioners, and last night announced the following gentlemen as the Board:

J. D. Flavelle, Lindsay, Chairman.

W. S. Dingman, Stratford, Vice-Chairman.

Frederick Dane, Toronto, Commissioner.

George T. Smith, Haileybury, Commissioner.

John A. Ayearst, Toronto, Commissioner.

These men have been chosen by the Prime Minister himself, who stated in the House that he would be responsible for the constitution of the Board. In addition to the appointment of the Commission, a proclamation has been issued bringing all the clauses of the new act into operation on May 5th next. On that date the 101 Boards in as many districts in the Province will be dissolved, and the new Board will proceed on its work of organization and administration. The date has been advisedly chosen, for on May 1st the new license year begins, and the last act of the old Boards will be to issue licenses for the new management.

Salaries to be paid the members of the Board will be as follows: Chairman, $6,500; Vice-Chairman, $6,000; Commissioners, $4,000 each.

Mr. J. D. Flavelle, Chairman, is a well-known merchant in Lindsay, and brother to Mr. J. W. Flavelle, who is connected with many industrial and financial institutions in Toronto. He was born in Peterborough in 1850 and has been engaged in business in Lindsay since 1864. All through his life he has been connected with public undertakings of one character or another. In 1901 he was appointed to the Dominion Grain Survey Board; is a Councillor of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association; Chairman of the Ross Memorial Association; and is a generous patron of amateur sport, and is one of the most widely known curlers in Canada.

Mr. W. S. Dingman, Vice-Chairman, is known throughout Canada as an enterprising and successful journalist. Born in 1858, he approached the editorial chair through the composing room. At different times he has owned the Strathroy "Despatch," Port Arthur "Daily Sentinel," and latterly, along with his brother, has owned and edited the Stratford "Herald." He has always maintained a sympathetic attitude towards temperance. In 1900 he was President of the Canadian Press Association, and exercises a wide influence in that association.

Mr. Frederick Dane was born in Belfast, Ireland, in 1861, and came to Canada in 1880. For many years he was a wholesale grocery importer in Toronto and had a connection in all parts of the world. Appointed member of the Temiskaming and Northern Railway Commission in 1906, he later became Land Commissioner, but resigned to accept the post of Canadian Commercial Agent at Glasgow, Scotland. He is a prominent Orangeman and is a Past President of the Irish Protestant Benevolent Society.

Mr. George T. Smith is Mining Recorder at Haileybury, and is intimately familiar with conditions in Northern Ontario. He not only understands the difficulties of administering the law in the unorganized districts, but his reputation and character will be of great assistance in enforcing the law in that country.

Mr. John A. Ayearst has a long record as an efficient and painstaking officer in the Liquor License branch. Through his unrelaxing efforts much of the irregularities that existed have been stamped out. His work in Ontario drew recognition from the Western Provinces, where he went three years ago, but returned later to this province to prosecute with diligence a task that few were equipped to undertake.

One of the first duties of the Board will be to make a survey of the Province, and establish new districts, fewer in number than the 101 that now exist.

The appointment of this Provincial Commission is the outstanding feature of the new Liquor License Legislation. The Board has jurisdiction over the entire Province and will supersede altogether the old Boards. The authority of the Board in the administration of the Liquor License Law shall be supreme and absolutely independent of political control.

The Board shall have all the authority of the present Liquor License Commissioners and many additional far-reaching powers.

The powers conferred by the Act upon the new Board are all of a restrictive nature.

The Boards has full authority to place such further restrictions upon the liquor traffic as it may deem advisable, but it cannot enlarge its privileges beyond what now exists.

Care has been taken in the framing of the legislation creating the Provincial Board to provide machinery that will enable the Board to administer the law in conformity with public sentiment in every locality.

The law provides that two members of the Board will form a quorum. The purpose of this is to enable the members of the Board to visit every part of the Province and to examine into local conditions.

The Board must hold at least one meeting each year in every county town in the Province, such meeting shall be open to the public—

1. To hear applicants and consider applications for licenses.
2. To hear representations from any source in opposition to the granting of any license.
3. To hear representations of any other nature regarding the Liquor License Law or the enforcement of it.
4. Notice of such meetings must be advertised locally for two weeks, and such notice must contain—
   (a) The name of the applicant
   (b) The character of the license applied for.
   (c) A description of the premises sought to be licensed.
   (d) The total number of existing tavern and shop licenses in each municipality in the county.
   (e) The total number of applications for tavern and shop licenses in each municipality in the county.

The extent and far-reaching effect of the new law and the advantages that will follow from the exhaustive powers conferred upon the new Board will readily be appreciated when it is understood that the new Board may—

1. Subdivide the Province into new license districts in such manner as experience and investigation may show to be advantageous to the better administration of the law.
2. Issue any form of restricted or special license, such as a "beer" license in any locality.
3. May issue licenses at any time of the year for any period of the year.
4. May shorten the hours within which liquor may be sold in taverns or shops throughout the Province, or in any portion, but cannot extend the hours beyond what the law now provides.
